I have already mentioned the Vestris disaster once or twice, but must do so again to explain one of the most vital provisions of the treaty—that pertaining to radio installations. The Vestris of course, had a radio send out its distress calls. Nearby, it afterward developed, was another ship, only a few miles away. It could easily have reached the Vestris in time to save all on board, but—and this is a very big "but" indeed—that ship had no radio. There it was, but a short distance away, able, willing, and equipped to save the lives aboard the Vestris, but it knew nothing about the disaster until long after the ill-fated vessel had sunk.

This treaty greatly widens the classes of ships and voyages where radio equipment is compulsory. Many more ships carry radio equipment now than are required by law to do so, but, under the pending treaty practically all vessels of any size going any considerable distance to sea would have to have the latest radio equipment. Such a network of radio equipment, scattered across the trade routes of the world, would make it practically impossible for a ship to sink before somebody reached her. Surely, this is a reasonable provision, which should appeal to the humanitarian heart of our people and to our well-known common sense. Radio is no longer an experiment. Its value has been demonstrated over and over again. It is indispensable to ship operation today. The treaty requirements on this point alone justify its prompt ratification.

During the past 2 or 3 years you've probably read of the "radio compass" as a remarkable device used in locating a ship in distress. The term is actually a misnomer. It would be more accurate to call it a radio "direction finder." It sounds like something mysterious, but it is really something very simple. If you are a radio "fan" and if your experience goes back to the "indoor" antennae, you probably remember the diamond-shaped frame of wire which you turned about until the radio signals came in clearly. The direction in which that diamond pointed indicated the direction from which the waves came to you. That, practically, is the principle of the radio compass. By its use each ship receiving a radio distress call can tell the direction from which the call comes. Of course, it cannot tell how far away it comes from. It can and does, however, "plot" the bearings and find that it comes from a point such and such degrees north or south. It immediately broadcasts this, together with its own position. If two other ships get the SOS and do the same thing, the problem is solved in a matter of seconds. A line is drawn on the map of the sea showing the bearings from the ship in distress to each of the three ships receiving the SOS. At some point within the boundary marked by those three ships those three lines will intersect—and that's where the distress ship lies, to within a mile.

It is not an exaggeration to say that, assuming three ships get the SOS the moment it is sent out, the exact position of the ship in distress can be determined within 2 minutes. Once that position is determined, it is broadcast by the three ships which determine it, and the news is picked up by ships which may be closer, and the race for life is on.

The pending treaty greatly increases the number of ships required to carry this "radio-compass" equipment. A great many more than the present law requires already carry such equipment, but such a valuable—or, rather, invaluable—device should be compulsory, and will be under this treaty.

This is but one of numerous inventions and improvements calculated to prevent loss of life at sea. The others are all important and every one is a reasonable requirement.

A major part of the treaty deals with the construction of the ship itself. This is the most important factor of safety. It requires the greatest possible advantage as to water-tight compartments and other construction features which tend to prevent sinking, no matter what type of accident befalls a vessel. The requirements for life-saving apparatus are based on the wide experiences with ships of all kinds during and since the World War. Life boats, rafts, fire prevention, and so forth, must all come up to the highest standards evolved from long experience. Most vessels of size, of course, are now thoroughly equipped in this respect, but existing law requirements are broadened and strengthened under the treaty.

You might ask, at this point, why we cannot stiffen and broaden our own laws without a treaty. We could and have, as have other nations, but Americans travel on the ships of practically all foreign lines and we need the treaty to bring not only our own ships but the ships of all nations under the same regulations. This treaty, then, not only lifts the standards of American ships but of the ships of the world.

Twenty-one years ago today, while making her maiden voyage, the Titanic, then the largest and finest passenger liner afloat, was lost with more than 1,500 souls. Many were Americans, both of high station and from the humble walks of life. Many known and unknown heroes on that occasion, with as great courage as it took to go "over the top," stood aside that others, women and children, might be saved. Such heroism deserves recognition. What more fitting tribute can be paid to their sacrifice, even after this long lapse of time, than to remember the lesson of that disaster, and of the all-too-many since, by ratifying the pending convention and making certain that such sacrifice has not been in vain.

30-HOUR WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to send to the desk and have read a letter. I request that the name signed to the letter and the writer's address may be omitted. I do that at the request of the writer of the letter.

I request also that the letter may be returned to me after it shall have been read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chief Clerk read the letter, as follows:

TOLEDO, OHIO, April 17, 1933.

Hon. HUGO BLACK.

SIR: Are you sponsor of the 30-hour week? If so, I would like to inform you that the Electric Auto Light & Co., Logan Gear Co., and Bingham Stamping Co. have made threats that if we don't sign papers that we do not want it passed we are subject to discharge on refusal to sign paper. We are all in favor of the law. If you are not sponsor please pass this to one who is.

Thanking you, I am,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to a resolution (H.Res. 108), as follows:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted an amendment to article V of the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And, also, that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House, any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 48. An act to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans.;

H.R. 1596. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Pee Dee River and a bridge across the Waccamaw River, both at or near Georgetown, S.C.;

H.R. 4127. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Waccamaw River near Conway, S.C.;

H.R. 4225. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Parkers Landing, in the county of Armstrong, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania;

H.R. 4332. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Allegheny River, at a point near the Forest-Venango County line, in Tionesta Township, and in the county of Forest, and in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania;

H.R. 4491. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, to construct a free overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio;

H.J.Res. 93. Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions; and

H.J.Res. 135. Joint resolution to amend section 2 of the act approved February 4, 1933, to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the pending amendment was prepared to be inserted on page 43, after line 5. It was to be offered at a time when the bill before the Senate had been otherwise completed. In other words, my amendment was intended to be part 6. Because the bill has not been otherwise completed, I ask permission at this time to withdraw the amendment offered in the nature of a substitute; and when the bill shall have been completed I then desire to reoffer the amendment. I reserve the right to reoffer the amendment at that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is withdrawn.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana. May we have it stated?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before leaving the Senate yesterday the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] requested me to withdraw his amendment when the opportunity was presented. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is withdrawn.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] has an individual amendment which he desires to offer at this time.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from New Jersey proposes to amend, on page 21, beginning with line 13, by striking out through line 19, on page 22, as follows:

FLOOR STOCKS

SEC. 16. (a) Upon the sale or other disposition of any article processed wholly or in chief value from any commodity with respect to which a processing tax is to be levied that, on the date the tax first takes effect or wholly terminates with respect to the commodity, is held for sale or other disposition (including articles in transit) by any person other than a consumer or a person engaged solely in retail trade, there shall be made a tax adjustment as follows:

(1) Whenever the processing tax first takes effect, there shall be levied, assessed, and collected a tax to be paid by such person equivalent to the amount of the processing tax which would be payable with respect to the commodity from which processed if the processing had occurred on such date.

(2) Whenever the processing tax is wholly terminated, there shall be refunded to such person a sum (or if it has not been paid, the tax shall be abated) in an amount equivalent to the processing tax with respect to the commodity from which processed.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), such subsection shall apply with respect to such portion of retail stocks on hand at the date the processing tax takes effect as is not sold or otherwise disposed of for consumption within one month after such date.

(c) For the purposes of this section the term "retail trade" shall not be held to include the business of an establishment which is owned, operated, maintained, or controlled by the same individual firm, corporation, or association that owns, operates, maintains, or controls any more than two other establishments of the same character.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, this section provides that in the case of goods processed from any commodity subject to the processing tax, if included in the inventories at the time the act becomes effective, they shall be taxed the equivalent as if they had been processed after the act takes effect.

A commodity, for instance, made only partly of cotton would be subject to the processing tax to the extent of the cotton in it. This would necessitate very complex figuring in converting the completed article back to the amount of raw cotton actually required in making the commodity. A large house might find thousands of items that would have to be "broken down" to find the content of the raw material contained therein and subject to the processing tax.

Inventory reports for the purpose of this taxation would have to be made more or less on arbitrary rules laid down by the Government, and the task of working out such rules would require many months, and the entire procedure would be extremely complicated. The final result of this would be that some taxpayers with adequate inventory records would eventually supply the Government with all the information required and pay the tax thereon, while the vast majority of people in business, having less complete records, would evade the tax, whether knowingly or otherwise.

The act further provides that retail stores shall not have to pay this inventory tax if the goods are sold for consumption within 1 month from the passage of the act. There is not one retailer out of many thousands who has his inventory records in such shape as to inform the Government with any real degree of accuracy the age of the articles on his shelves. In other words, the auditing task that the Government would face would not only be tremendous but would be almost impossible of accomplishment. The act also provides for a refunding at the termination of the life of the act, based, of course, on another inventory at that time. The result of this would be that the Government would be deluged with claims which it would either have to pay or refute the claim by conducting another audit. The whole procedure would be cumbersome, expensive, and generally unsatisfactory.

I feel that for the Government to impose any tax on inventories at all would be to multiply the administrative effort of the Government many times over the amount of the tax involved, besides being discriminatory, in that concerns with adequate inventory records would pay the full amounts due, while concerns with less adequate records would find the door open to evasion, whether, as I have said, knowingly or otherwise.

In a word, Mr. President, I feel that this provision of the bill is impossible of operation. I believe I know something whereof I speak, and I speak for a great many others who agree with me. I do not see how this provision of the bill could possibly be administered. I believe it would lead to a great deal of confusion and in many instances, whether intentional or otherwise, injustices will grow out of it. I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that my amendment to strike out the section will prevail.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have had a great many protests filed with me against the particular provision of the pending bill which the amendment proposes to eliminate. I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is in charge of the bill, what objection there can be to the adoption of the amendment? It seems to me every principle of equity and justice should direct us to the elimination of the provision by accepting the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the committee discussed this question very fully. It was the judgment of the committee that when the processing tax goes into effect there will be held by many processors a large volume of raw material and therefore the tax should be levied against such material. The provision also proposes to levy a tax against that which is in transit.

So far as the equity of the matter is concerned, I think if we are going to levy the tax it should be equitably distributed, and as it is applicable to the material wherever stored this is an essential part of the provision. I am afraid that elimination of the provision will open the door to the accumulation of a tremendous stock previous to the going into effect of the bill, and therefore will enable a great many of the producers to escape payment of the tax.

Mr. WALSH. When does the bill become operative after passage?

Mr. SMITH. The Secretary of Agriculture is to determine when it shall become operative as to any particular commodity and is to issue his proclamation to that effect. As to each commodity there is what is called a consuming or productive period. Each commodity will have a basic year. In the case of cotton the year will begin the 1st of August. Whether the Secretary of Agriculture will issue a proclamation declaring that the year during which the tax on cotton shall apply shall coincide with what is known as the "cotton year", I do not know, of course. The fact is, I think no one can determine definitely under the terms of the bill what would be a year to be set aside for operation of the tax except by an arbitrary declaration on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. The point which the Senator is making is that it may be any period of time between the signing of the bill by the President and the time when the processing tax upon any given commodity may be first applied by the declaration of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. If the bill were to take effect immediately, there might be an inconsequential amount of what is known as "floor stock", that is, stock already bought. But if any appreciable time should elapse, it is perfectly evident that if the tax is going to be applied everyone will avail himself of that interim to accumulate an amount of stock which would not be taxed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That would place those who are compelled to pay the tax at a very great disadvantage in competing with those who would have accumulated stocks for the express purpose of avoiding the tax.

Mr. SMITH. Yes. That was brought out before the committee. If the taxing year would become operative immediately upon the passage of the bill——

Mr. WALSH. Why could not that be done?

Mr. SMITH. That is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture under the terms of the bill as it now stands. He is to declare by proclamation at what time the taxing year shall begin. I appreciate fully the point of the Senator from New Jersey in offering the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The provision is protested very vigorously, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; because many people have stocks on hand which they bought in good faith and have since sold against them. Therefore there is provision in the bill that in the case of those who hold an accumulated stock against which they have already sold for future delivery goods made out of such stock, the processor is not liable for the tax. The vendee becomes liable and not the vendor. Whenever it is made known that the goods produced out of the stock on hand when the tax goes into effect have already been sold for forward delivery, then the vendee pays the tax and not the vendor. But if he has not sold the goods against his stock or if there is any doubt about it, he pays the tax on the floor stock he possesses, and his right to pass the tax on will be according to his ability to show that he made a contract previous to the time when the tax was levied.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am entirely in sympathy with the situation described by the able Senator from South Carolina, who is in charge of the bill. I have spoken to a number of people about the point he raises. I am still convinced, however, that this very complicated bill—and certainly without any criticism I can say it is a very complicated bill—contains probably no feature, which from a mercantile point of view is going to be more difficult to operate, so far as those who pay the tax are concerned, than is this particular feature; and the Government, in order to collect the tax, in my opinion, if it shall do so with any degree of fairness, will be put to an expense for auditing that will exceed the amount that it can possibly collect. The result, I am sure, as I said a few moments ago, is going to be that many concerns which are in a position to do so will be able to make a good statement of their situation as covered by this section, while others will not be, and there will be definite discrimination and confusion.

While I realize that the wishes of the Senator from South Carolina probably will prevail, I do hope that this amendment will be adopted, and I make that statement with nothing but the friendliest feeling. I offered it because I felt it my duty to do so in the light of the widespread protests that came to me from people who are anxious to conform to this law, whatever it may be, when it shall be passed, as I suppose it will be.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as a matter of course, taking this title in its entirety, if this part is eliminated it will lead, in my opinion, to confusion, and I think will further complicate the bill. However, I will leave the matter entirely to the judgment of the Senate. Let them vote on it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD some written protests I have had against this provision of the bill which the amendment seeks to correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., April 12, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate:

Associated industries of Massachusetts believes it would be impractical to impartially collect proposed tax on retail floor stocks in the farm bill, and is of the opinion that the Bankhead amendment is unfair.

O. L. STONE.

WATERTOWN, MASS., April 12, 1933.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building:

We wish to protest against tax on retail floor stocks in proposed farm bill as being unfair and practically impossible to impartially collect.

W. HARVEY LUCAS,
President Watertown Chamber of Commerce.

BOSTON, MASS., April 12, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building:

We strongly disapprove processing tax, as well as tax on retail floor stocks in proposed farm bill. Think Bankhead amendment unfair and discriminatory.

AMORY COOLIDGE,
Vice President Pepperell Manufacturing Co.

NEW YORK, N.Y., April 12, 1933.

Hon. Senator DAVID I. WALSH:

Representing our 1,500 Massachusetts employees, we think tax on floor stock in proposed farm bill unreasonable. Impracticable to collect tax fairly. Also think Bankhead amendment unfair and discriminatory. Your cooperation in blocking this measure would be appreciated.

S. M. JONES,
President Arnold Print Works, North Adams, Mass.

MILFORD, MASS., April 15, 1933.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building:

We protest vigorously against the floor tax contained farm relief bill, especially against discriminatory feature contained Bankhead amendment. If same should come to vote, we urge you vote against it in interest simple justice, because to do otherwise would lend administration stamp approval to unwarranted discrimination between different business classes.

ARCHER RUBBER CO.

GARDNER, MASS., April 11, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

As a voter, taxpayer, and employer of labor in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, I hereby enter a protest to a proposed provision in the proposed farm bill, namely, the tax on floor stocks, and emphatically against the discriminatory parts of the Bankhead amendment. Practically impossible to collect floor tax from most merchants.

F. A. HARNISH.

BOSTON, MASS, April 9, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

C. F. Hovey Co., a Massachusetts corporation, 100 years in retail business in Boston, lately affiliated with other stores, its officers, stockholders, and employees numbering 600, object to discriminatory features of Bankhead amendment to farm relief bill, which singles out certain stores and puts an unfair and unequitable tax on them as against other stores.

C. F. HOVEY CO.

WATERTOWN, MASS., April 12, 1933.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building:

We believe Bankhead amendment to farm bill unfair and discriminatory, and it seems to us that a tax on retail floor stocks would be almost impossible to collect fairly.

ARTHUR B. NEWHALL,
President Hood Rubber Co.

FIRST NATIONAL STORES, INC.,
Somerville, Mass., April 10, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The farm relief bill, if enacted in its present form, is going to be a serious blow to the consumers of our State, and particularly so under present conditions of unemployment and general depression.

The unfair discrimination in the taxing of stocks on hand in chain stores, to which must be immediately added processing charges, will still further accentuate the New England consumer's problem. Such discrimination not only is unjust but possibly unconstitutional. The preponderance of patronage of the chain store comes from the wage earner and those of moderate income, and this class is certainly entitled to equal consideration with those that are more fortunate in world's goods and can afford the comfort and expense of credit and service. This latter class has in effect a 30-day privilege, exempt from this particular taxation. The less fortunate are taxed immediately.

I am sure your voice and influence will be offered in opposition to such discriminatory provision, and as well must believe that you will contest vigorously for the general interest of Massachusetts citizens.

We believe that the agriculturist should be helped in some way, although their troubles are largely due to overproduction. The farmer is not the only one that has made a similar mistake. In sugar, copper, and generally all along the line, overproduction has been permitted, in fact, encouraged. Farmers in northern Maine complain of their low potato market, but when they have practically doubled the acreage in the last 6 or 7 years and are producing more potatoes than people can ordinarily consume, whose fault is it but their own?

Sincerely yours,

C. F. ADAMS, Treasurer.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is my intention to speak on the bill as a whole, and in the course of the discussion to undertake a rather definite analysis of certain of its parts.

The purpose of the bill is to relieve the farmers of America, and thereby turn the tide of general disaster—a purpose to which every one of us subscribes and which none of us would resist.

This purpose, I do not hesitate to say after very earnest examination, cannot be accomplished by this bill, not so long as 2 and 2 make 4. Assuming every premise and every price increase predicated, this bill cannot succeed.

Mr. President, if it cannot succeed, and we go to the country in this year, after a long period of disappointed hopes, and after 45 months of depression which we cannot say we have successfully coped with in any degree, if we fail now, I hesitate to consider the consequences.

It is my judgment, Mr. President, that this is no time for experiments with the Government or with its processes; and that if we may possibly find, by hesitation and deliberation, an assured way of accomplishing the purposes which every one of us has at heart, we can well afford the delay entailed.

Mr. President, let me read to the Senate the declared policy or purposes of the bill:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress—

(1) To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period. The base period in the case of all agricultural commodities except tobacco shall be the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914. In the case of tobacco, the base period shall be the post-war period, September 1919–August 1928.

That is the first objective of the bill.

(2) To approach such equality of purchasing power by gradual correction of the present inequalities therein at as rapid a rate as is deemed feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets.

(3) To protect the consumers' interest by readjusting farm production at such level as will not increase the percentage of the consumers' retail expenditures for agricultural commodities, or products derived therefrom, which is returned to the farmer, above the percentage which was returned to the farmer in the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914.

In a word, it is the declared policy of the bill—and if the Congress adopts it, of the Congress—to turn back the clock 20 years. Old King Canute undertook to beat back the waves of the sea; but, so far as I know, this is the first time that any human being since has undertaken to turn back the tides of time.

They tell us that we are to look for "happy days"; that "happy days are here again"; and those happy days, Senators, are to be the happy days of the Taft administration! The consumers of America and the farmers of America are to be returned to the conditions under the Payne-Aldrich tariff of the Taft administration, of the return from Elba, and of that discontent in America which drove from power the party responsible for those conditions, and left it, as I recollect, with but two States to its credit in the electoral college.

But even if it were good to return to those days, since our memories are not so accurate, and since at least we Democrats have subscribed to the view that the revolution in America that brought on "the new freedom" and Woodrow Wilson was justified by the underlying conditions—even if the return to those days would improve in any measurable way our condition, I am here to say that, while there may be something of infinite power hidden somewhere in the earth of which I know nothing, there is no power in this Government and there is no power in this Congress to undo the processes of 20 years of history, of 20 years of the most portentous history in all the story of mankind, and restore to farmers and consumers, or to either or to anyone, the status quo of 1909–14.

The water under the dam, the extravagances and the follies, the Great War itself, with consequences to be compared only with the consequences of Adam's first disobedience and the fall—all these stand in our way with a peculiar power and force, and would block us even though we might assume that under happier conditions, and at the end of a period less tremendous in its events, we might make some measurable progress by way of turning back the clock for 20 years and undoing all the processes of history and of experience.

Mr. President, it was Joshua, the great captain of the conquest of the Promised Land, who made the sun to stand still on Gibeon and the moon to pause in the vale of Ajalon, but it is not in the power of Ezekiel. No modern and no ancient Ezekiel could arrest the tide of time; and he might just as well have ordered, in the bill which has been prepared for us, that this old world should reverse her course and turn backward 365 days in the year on her axis from the east to the west, and then reverse her course upon her great orbit and go the other way for 20 years.

We may apply logarithms to hogs and the formulas of calculus to wheat, but we cannot restore the status quo between consumers and producers in our land as of 20 years ago.

Something has been said about relative prices. I am here to say that while Mr. Einstein has made something of a contribution by way of the theory of relativity in the vast universe which surrounds us, I do not understand that the Einstein theory of relativity can be applied to a great population, or to the hogs and the wheat and the corn and the cotton which they produce from year to year. Yet nothing less than that is solemnly proposed in this bill.

It is as if we should undertake to get from the Arabian Nights and Bagdad a magic carpet, and undertake to sail back and find ourselves not moving from place to place but from one era back to another, from one set of conditions back to another.

Suppose, Mr. President, we could move backward in the mere matter of relation of prices; what does this bill do with the $11,000,000,000 of the farm debt? That goes back, and will someone tell me that the farmers of the United States could pay $11,000,000,000 of their indebtedness under the conditions of 1909 to 1914?

Suppose we could ride upon this magic carpet, and place ourselves once again under the conditions of prices and profits, the relative relation of purchasing power, as of that far date. Suppose we could. What would we have to say as to the capacity of ourselves so placed, and particularly as to the capacity of the farmers of the United States so placed, to pay the annual taxes, which have risen in this 20-year period by from 700 to a thousand percent; and of America as a whole, for this bill takes in the consumer and the producer, undertaking on the basis of the relative purchasing power of the farmer in 1909 to 1914 as compared with the things he sells and the things he buys? Go back to it, and then tell me how the American people with that income will bear the load of $150,000,000,000 of debt, of $14,000,000,000 of annual taxes, and of from six to seven billion dollars of annual interest.

I submit that these are the facts and these are the conditions with which this bill proposes to deal, and I submit that it is more impossible to bring prosperity to the American people, more impossible to arrest the fateful tide of this series of disasters which we call the depression, it is more impossible to do that thing in this way, than it is to turn the sun backward in its course from day to day for 20 long years.

Mr. President, it never occurred to me before that the period from 1909 to 1914 was such a good period. That was the period when the discontent was so thoroughgoing in this country that "Roosevelt the First" bolted his party, led a revolt, tore down the old temple of the party which had made him President, and made the way for the first Democratic administration since the days of Grover Cleveland. Yet we Democrats here now, invested with the power of the country, propose nothing better for ourselves, nothing better for our fellow men, nothing better for our country than that we shall return to precisely the same conditions which thrust the Republicans out of power, which laid the foundation of the Bull Moose movement, and gave us an 8-year tenure of office, not to carry out the policies then in vogue but to destroy them, and place the doctrines of the new freedom in their stead.

Mr. President, the whole fallacy of this bill is this: It attempts, with the 1914 parity, to establish something in the nature of an income for the farmer, and, with all due respect to the scientific gentlemen and the great economists who prepared it, omits the primary and overwhelming factors of the farmer's debt, the farmer's taxes, and the farmer's wages.

I have here the chart prepared by the Department of Agriculture of the United States of prices received by the farmers and prices paid for commodities by farmers, farm wages, and farm taxes. If we have any authority for our information, this is the official authority. Upon the reading of the map one can well understand why the 1909 to 1914 base was taken. It does happen that in 1909 to 1914 the line of farmer's prices received and the line of farmer's prices paid and the relative line of farmer's taxes and the relative line of wages he paid his workers ran together, until about 1915. Watch the lines and see where this chart places us on the threshold of this legislation at this very hour.

Where are the farmer's taxes? They are at point 170. What does this bill proposed to do? It proposes to lift the farmer's prices from the point 80 to the point 100, a mere matter of the relation of the figure or quantity 20 to the figure 170. I hope Senators get the force of that. We help him 20 points, when, so far as taxes are concerned, he is in the hole 170 points. It is as if a man were in a well 170 feet deep and we lifted him 20 feet from the bottom, and told him we had done something for him.

Take the commodities. The commodities purchased by farmer are at point 130. The farmer's point is the point 80. We propose to carry the farmer to the point 100, which is 20 points, and he still has 30 points to go to get on the former level.

We may take the same thing with regard to the farmer's debt. We propose to lift the prices which the farmer receives by the sum of a possible 20 to 30 points, getting back to the 1910 to 1915 level, and we leave him there with a debt of $11,000,000,000 around his neck and tell him we have done something for him. I wonder what he will say to that. How will he ever pay that debt? The debt has risen, as we know, from about three billion to eleven billion, 250 points, and we tell him we are going to do something for him, and we lift him up 20 to 30 points in his prices. That is the size of this bill.

Mr. President, here is the document of the Department of Agriculture. Here is the price level; and if we hold out to the farmer the hope, if we tell the farmer we have done something for him, we tell him that knowing that we lifted his prices 30 points, knowing that his debts and his taxes and his wages were still from 50 to 200 points above the level of 1910 to 1915, I wonder what he will say when the realities come home to him.

The President offers us this bill as an experiment. I want to know where is the compulsion here for us blindly to proceed in the performance of an experiment with the American people?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very much interested in the Senator's argument that we are only helping the farmer to increase commodity prices 20 to 30 points and that we are doing nothing with reference to his taxes and his debt. Can the Senator point out how Congress can give the farmer any relief with reference to his taxes and his debt?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall come to that, and I would not have undertaken to say what I have said without the full intention of coming to that.

The President proposes this vast undertaking as an experiment. I am going to offer my humble opinion with the utmost respect. I desire to uphold the President's hands. I desire to defend his administration. I want it to succeed, not for his sake, and not for the sake of the Democratic Party, either, but I want it to succeed for the sake of the masses of mankind here and throughout the world.

Mr. President, it is my sober judgment that we cannot render a better service to the President, to the party, to the country, when a matter is proposed to us here as an experiment, than to look it over, try to see through it, and, if we are convinced that the experiment cannot succeed, to have the courage and the candor and the sympathy and the friendship for the President himself frankly to say so, and to seek, as the Senator from Florida has just now suggested, a way by which we can have some assurance that it will meet the demands of a situation so great and so crucial.

I wish now to address myself, just for a moment, in passing to the rather natural urgency that we have had here for the passage of this bill. I can understand the attitude of Senators who press us to abandon our arguments and to make way for votes; but, Mr. President, we had better delay a week or 10 days and not disappoint the hopes of the American people and not make a blunder of which they and we will be the victims so long as we live and our children after us; we had better delay rather than make such a mistake.

Moreover, it is entirely too late, Mr. President, for this bill to do the American farmers any good whatever this year, and, since the time is past, why should we not take time to find a better way? Here is what the President himself said:

> The proposed legislation is necessary now for the simple reason that the spring crops will soon be planted—> and if we wait for another month or 6 weeks the effect on the prices of this year's crops will be wholly lost.

That was on March 16, and this, if I mistake not, is April 18; the month is gone. There is not one of us here who believes that the bill will pass the other House and the Senate and emerge from conference on the Senate amendments within the space of 5 or 6 more days. There is nobody in America who takes the view that this bill can be put into any sort of substantial effect in 2 weeks or 3 weeks or 4 weeks or 5 weeks. When we look abroad over our land today, we see that all the wheat that will ever be gathered this year is up; all the hogs that will be slaughtered this year have been farrowed; practically all the cotton that will be gathered this year has been planted or the land has been prepared for it. I think, in all of Texas except for the panhandle, all of Alabama, all of Mississippi, all of Georgia except the extreme northern part, all of eastern North Carolina—I can speak for that section definitely—practically everywhere through the Cotton Belt we know that by the 1st of May every seed that is going to be worthwhile has been placed in the rows.

So far as tobacco is concerned, it requires no stretch of imagination to see the plant beds with the plants 5 and 6 inches high on every hillside in the Tobacco Belt, and if the rains and the seasons are favorable the tobacco planters will be transplanting those plants into the furrows every day now, with a view to having all the tobacco that is going to be planted set out by the 1st of May. Yet this bill was projected in contemplation of inducements to the farmers, by way of certain rewards held out through the medium of a rather hopeless taxation, to cut their crops in the year 1933.

So I say, Mr. President, that, so far as the time limit of this bill is concerned, and so far as any necessity for expedition is demanded, the time has passed, and every one of the crops will have been planted before the Congress or the President or the Secretary of Agriculture can offer any inducement to even 10 percent of them. There is, therefore, no reason for haste.

Mr. President, so far I have argued that the bill cannot in any manner meet the necessities of the farmer's plight. I will not undertake to sum it up; I have given the Senate the facts; I have given them the chart. I think I must have demonstrated that there is very little hope; there is very little of reward; there is nothing of compensation; there is nothing of antidote to the woes of the farmers or our woes in this proposal to restore the purchasing power of the period, from 1909 to 1914, in view of the fact that they must deal with and they must bear the burden of 1933 debts, of 1933 interest, of 1933 taxes, and of 1933 wages.

I will proceed now to an examination of some of the details of the bill, and more especially with respect to cotton. I am going to address my remarks very largely to the Senators from the cotton States. I affirm with the utmost deliberation, and knowing the meaning of my words, that there is not in this bill one penny for any farmer in the South, so far as cotton is concerned.

What does it propose? It proposes to levy a tax on the domestic processor that will lift the price of cotton from its present level of 6½ cents a pound to from 12 to 12½ cents a pound. That is not disputed. It proposes to do that with respect only to the American consumer and the American mills. It happens to be one of the facts, with which we somehow find ourselves unwilling to reckon, that the farmers who produce the cotton of our land sell 9,000,000 bales in the foreign market, and not one penny of any tax will ever go to them. We know that and they know that, and nobody will contend to the contrary. So, assuming that the tax will be effectual and that it will be 6 cents, we find that that 6 cents is confined to five fourteenths of the normal crop, or the 5,000,000 bales consumed in this country.

Now, let us make the calculation: Five fourteenths is approximately one third, and one third of 6 is 2. So, on the face of this bill, all the cotton farmer could get is 2 cents more a pound. But he will not get that. He will have to pay his part of the tax if he ever buys a shirt or a pair of cotton socks. If he is a consumer, like the rest of us—and the bill predicates that he will be a consumer—he pays his share of the tax; and so we will take that off. Further, he will get the benefit of the tax only on condition that he reduces his crop; he has got to reduce it out of that 2 cents. So we will take that off. I do not know how much it will be. Further, he has got to stand for the expense. I do not know what that will be, but I can see the swarms of new officeholders, and I can read the bill, and I can read the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture when he calls for $15,000 salaries, although I think the committee finally persuaded him that he had better stick to $10,000 salaries.

So, when the farmer pays his part of the tax, reduces his part of the crop, pays his part of the expense of the administration—trusting, after those deductions have been made, to the tender mercies of the Secretary of Agriculture to give him the balance—I think it will be a case of minus rather than plus. All of that is taken from the 2 cents; and there never has been a 2-cent piece on earth that would account for that much.

That is the size of the cotton proposition. I would not hold out to the cotton farmers of North Carolina, to whom I am responsible, the hope—I would be ashamed to go home if I did—that there was one penny in this bill for them.

So far as tobacco is concerned—and that is now the principal crop of my State——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. Perhaps there has been a mistake made by the Department and those who drafted this bill in reference to cotton.

Mr. BAILEY. I think there have been several mistakes made.

Mr. SMITH. Let us devote ourselves to this one. The inclusion of the provision establishing the basic period as that from 1909 to 1914 contemplated evidently 12 cents a pound or 12½ cents a pound for all the cotton, for the entire crop, and not merely for that portion domestically consumed. Therefore, if the Senator will make the computation, he will find that, in order to bring the cotton crop, all of it, up to the 12-cents-a-pound price, which is supposed to be the objective——

Mr. BAILEY. That is to bring up to that price the 5,000,000 bales domestically consumed.

Mr. SMITH. No; to bring the entire crop up to that point.

Mr. BAILEY. Then call it 14,000,000 bales.

Mr. SMITH. Let us assume that during the base period all cotton brought 12 cents, that every bale, both exported and domestically consumed cotton, brought that amount. In order to bring that parity back, we must have 12 cents on the entire cotton crop. In order to do that, cotton now being worth 6½ cents and 45 percent of it being domestically consumed and 55 percent being exported, it is necessary to get a price on the 45 percent which, added to the present price of 6 cents a pound would bring the average of the entire crop to 12½ cents. Therefore, we would have for the domestically consumed portion 21 cents, or $105 a bale in order to obtain an average of 12½ cents a pound.

Mr. BAILEY. And unquestionably the consumers of America would pay that bill.

Mr. SMITH. That is the real condition. To take 100 bales of cotton as an illustration, 55 of them at 6 cents a pound and 45 of them at such a price as will make the average crop bring 12½ cents, it will be found that it is necessary to have 21 cents, or $105 a bale, for the 45 bales domestically consumed in order to bring the average up to 12½ cents a pound.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator will agree that that line of argument was not made in the hearings and was not made by the Senator himself. I recall the speech he made in which he used the figure—not 21 but 12½.

Mr. SMITH. I call attention to the fact that it was provided both in the previous bill and in this bill that the extreme amount of the tax would be 6 cents a pound. I figured out then that there would be a little less than 2 cents a pound, and that was the official statement that we received—that there would be added only 6 cents a pound.

Mr. BAILEY. That is exactly what I am arguing, if I may say so.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; but there is where I claim there has been a very serious and fatal mistake.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator. That is exactly what I was undertaking to say. There has been a very serious and fatal mistake, I believe. The same serious and fatal mistake is proposed with reference to tobacco. We must bear in mind that on the average 40 percent of the tobacco produced in America is exported. The tax should not apply except on the other 60 percent. I am going a little farther and bear in mind with respect to the tobacco in my own State that 60 percent of it is exported and 40 percent is consumed domestically. The authors of the bill—I do not know who they were—were so startled by their own theory, were confronted with the facts of 1909 and 1914 with respect to tobacco with such force that they actually abandoned the entire theory of the bill and fixed tobacco on post-war prices, and that in itself condemns the intellectual honesty of the men who conceived the plan. They cannot blow hot and cold with this question. It is either right to find the pre-war basis or right to find the post-war basis, but they cannot play both ends against the middle.

So much for that. I am now going into the bill. The bill appears to me to be in the nature of and in the manner of and after the form of a sandwich. Part 1, the authorship of which is justly due to the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and which I have supported heretofore and will support as long as I have the opportunity, is the good section of the bill. It would do more to get rid of the surplus, to lift the price of cotton, to relieve the farmers of the South, than all the rest of the bills that have been proposed in the Congress in 2 years. I am for it. That is the top layer of the sandwich and it is very attractive. I voted for it. I shall vote for it again, and I shall welcome an opportunity now to vote for it as a separate measure. I hope to introduce an amendment which will give me that opportunity.

Title 2, the agricultural-credit section of the bill, is also acceptable. Relief of the financial or farm-mortgage debtors' burden is absolutely indispensable. Mr. President, the farmers of America are bearing the burden of these mortgages upon their back; and whether at present prices or at the pre-war basis of prices, the burden is unbearable. With respect to these mortgages and these debts and these burdens we have to face the alternative of relief or ruin.

I make the assertion that the financial features of the agricultural-credit section of the bill will do a great deal more for the land banks than for the farmer. I am much more concerned with relief for the farmers than I am with relief for the land banks, but I am willing to relieve both if thereby I can relieve the farmer. I think it will boost the price of land-bank bonds. It might relieve the stockholders of the land banks from threatened assessments, but it also cuts down the farmer's interest, it cuts down the farmer's debt, gives the farmer a breathing spell. But with interest down and debts down and a breathing spell altogether, if he is not to get any more out of his harvest this year relatively than he got in 1909 and 1914, then God help him! The bill will not avail. He needs something more.

Between those two layers of the sandwich, the attractive upper portion and the attractive under portion, is the middle part of the sandwich, and it ought to be the meat of the sandwich. But instead of meat I undertake to say that the processing tax and the price-fixing theory are the most veritable concoction of legislative confusion and ineffectiveness, the most veritable composition of political and economic poison, the most far-fetched and far-reaching vagaries that ever gave promise of passage by the Congress. This section will not only not save the farmer but it will tend to destroy the Republic, and I wish to be heard on that for a moment.

It never occurred to me that I would live to see the day when it would be coolly proposed anywhere in America that we should so far forget the liberties which we received from our fathers, and which are guaranteed in the Constitution as to undertake to fix a price by actual law anywhere in this land. When we fix it by taxation, we fix it just as much as if we did it by an imperial decree from a throne. It never occurred to me that it would be proposed in this Congress that we should make it a crime to pay less than the price fixed by a Secretary or the Congress or a President. We have tried to mollify that damnable proposition by making the thousand-dollar penalty recoverable in a civil suit. I do not know that there is any great difference. The penalty is a penalty and the effect of it is to destroy liberty in America.

I said something about the preservation of the Republic. She is not going by way of arms. I am not afraid of that. She is not going by sedition and conspiracy. This Republic will go when American liberty goes, in every step we take, giving way here and giving way there, negativing personal liberty or the right of personal property or the right of personal security almost unawares—here and here, there and there, forgetting the great traditions of the past that ought to guide us, forgetting the great standards by means of which the Republic has ever lived and must live, forgetting the spiritual fountains that have made her the source of light and life for 144 years. When we forget, when we cease to exercise eternal vigilance, we begin to see the Republic taking a transformation and losing a character which amounts to more than revolution.

What happened abroad? Everywhere this depression has had the effect of destroying liberty. It destroyed it in Italy. It destroyed it in Russia. The other day it destroyed it in Germany. Here we are setting out upon a course of fixing prices by decree, fixing prices by taxation, setting up over the whole fabric of industry and agriculture one man with supreme power, and it does not occur to us that we are thereby throwing into the crucible of this depression the character of the Republic itself.

To go into a more definite and specific analysis of the bill:

The bill proposes the most oppressive series of taxes that were ever proposed by any government, whether free or tyrannic. One of our Senators referred the other day to taxes on wheat imposed by Louis XVI in France as being 55 percent. If the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is correct, we propose a tax on cotton of 300 percent, we propose a tax on wheat of 100 percent, and we propose a similar tax on hogs. What comfort is it to the American citizen to lay that tax and then tell him we are going to take it from the consumer and hand it over to him? If it does not oppress him, it oppresses the other man, and if he hates oppression of himself, he will hate the oppression of other men.

On the other hand, this tax will not be paid by the mills. We know that. It will not be paid by the cotton or tobacco factories. We know that. If this tax is to be laid, it is going to be paid by the consumers of America, and we all know that.

Who are the consumers of America? Who are the people that wear cotton shirts in America? Who are the people that eat the wheat of America? Who are the people that eat the pork of America? It is the American people. It is the poor fellow in the bread line. It is the man out of work. It is the man whose wages have already been cut in half. It is all America. When these taxes go on, if they ever go on, they are going on by way of reduced consumption and oppression and privation, and they will reflect themselves in the last analysis in an unbearable burden on the back of the farmer himself. Cut off his domestic consumption, deprive or limit him in his domestic market, and we will compel him to sell what he has left in the merciless markets of the world. He will pay it in the last analysis. That is the proposition. The poor have always paid the taxes in the last analysis. We may lay it on whom we please, we may lay it any way we please; but if I know anything about taxes, they are a burden on the back of the man who bends between the plow handles, who runs the machine, who works in the ditch. Taxes press down upon the great body of the helpless population in every respect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Will it interrupt the Senator to ask whether, from his very careful examination and analysis of the bill, he has reached the conclusion that the bill will increase the burdens upon the consumer?

Mr. BAILEY. It will place burdens on the consumer first. Apparently it puts a burden on the processor, but he passes it on to the consumer.

(At this point the Senate, sitting as a court for the trial of articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louderback, resumed its session, and Mr. BAILEY temporarily yielded the floor. The impeachment proceedings appear following his remarks.)

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when we were interrupted by the impeachment proceedings, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] had asked me if I was claiming that the consumer would bear the burden of these processing taxes. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I intended to inquire whether, in the opinion of the Senator, all of the burdens imposed by this bill—burdens which it is alleged will be brought about by reason of the increase of prices of farm commodities—will not finally rest upon the poor consumers throughout the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator wish me to answer that?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not claim that, and I am glad the Senator has asked me the question. I think I can make something clear here about taxes.

This tax will rest first as a burden upon the processor; and it will be a real burden, as all taxes are. He will pass it on to the consumer, and it will be a real burden to the consumer, as all taxes are. He will pass it on to everybody else he can, back to the farmer; and finally it will manifest itself in reduced consumption, and the farmer will pay the bill at the expense of selling his surpluses in the world market.

That is the iniquity of taxation. It curses every human being it falls upon whenever it gets beyond the point of being for the necessities of the Government. Old Adam Smith said that 150 years ago and it looks as if the world will never learn it; and, last of all, it seems as if the taxpayers will never learn it. The great body of the people do not seem to learn it.

There is no escape from the burden of a tax on the whole body politic. It strikes the consumer in the present circumstances with terrifying power and ruinous force, but it does not rest there. It goes all the way through. I trust I have made that plain.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, then, this bill is not for the benefit of the consumer; and no one here, apparently, unless it is the able Senator, is making any plea in behalf of the great body of consumers of the United States upon whom these burdens ultimately must rest.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not claim to be making any plea for anybody. I never in my life got up and said I was a friend of this one or that one. I am undertaking to analyze the bill and tell the truth about it. I think every man in the Senate is just as good a friend of the farmer as every other man. I have always thought so; and I do not like it when people assume that they are the special friends of anyone. We are Senators. We are legislators. We have our oaths to keep and our duties to perform. I do not make any professions of great friendship in any direction. I let men judge me by what I do. I think every Senator here is just as good a friend of the American people, all of them together, as every other man is; and I shall always maintain that attitude. I think every man here wants to get rid of this depression just as earnestly as every other man does. Of course he does—every man in America.

I think it is time somebody said in the Senate that we Senators are not sitting here indifferently. We have the same concerns that the fathers of the little families have in their homes. We have the same problems. We have the same hearts. We are all in earnest about this. We are trying to find the truth about this matter. We are trying to do the right thing.

I do not hesitate to say that if I thought this bill would meet the demands of this situation and not destroy the character of our Republic, no power would keep me from supporting it. Thinking as I do, no power in the world can make me support it. I know it is wrong. I have already shown by the facts and figures that it is wrong; but I am not through with the analysis.

This bill has a lot of comfort for the processors. This bill, by way of comfort and consolation to the processors and getting them to support it, and having succeeded in very large measure, coolly proposes to abrogate the antitrust laws of the United States; and I want to drive that home. Where are the processors? Where is the process taxpayers' lobby? They folded their tents like the Arabs and silently stole away 2 weeks ago. We are not having any trouble here by any lobby of that sort. They have gone. You cannot find one in Washington. Why? Here is why:

Mr. Ezekiel—

This is the testimony before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, on page 19:

The language of paragraph 2—

Which I will read, if necessary—

modifies the application of the antitrust laws to a degree and in the same way that the Capper-Volstead Act modifies the application of the antitrust law to cooperative-marketing associations—

And that is an absolute abrogation.

Again—

Under the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture instead of the Department of Justice—

We simply get a new king.

I think the English-speaking race has labored some 500 years to put up a structure forbidding unreasonable restraints of trade and destroying monopolies; but, as the price of the acquiescence of the process taxpayers in this legislation, we propose at one swoop to let them combine, fix rules, and determine charges; and Mr. Ezekiel, the author of the thing, as I am informed—I do not know—himself tells us that it will abrogate the antitrust laws.

Now, what is the picture?

Here is the farmer on one hand. He is taxed. Here is the consumer over here. He is taxed. Here is the industry over here. It is combined; and the new ruler of America, not responsible to the American people in any way whatever, not the Congress and not the President but the Secretary of Agriculture, is supreme over all.

It is a singular commentary that I make here, that the man who rules Russia is not a president, and not a king; he is a secretary. The title of Mr. Stalin is "Secretary of the Soviet Union of Russia." I will not dwell on that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, may I ask him if he does not wish to modify the statement as to the Secretary of Agriculture being the ruler? I notice in the morning Post the following:

Miss Perkins asks control of production. Held backed by President.

It would seem as if there is to be a competitor to the Secretary of Agriculture, to wit, the Secretary of Labor, who is to control production in the United States. I thought the Senator might want to modify his statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I believe it is a good rule, since we go back to the past—and I hope I may speak it lightly—that wherever we have a king, we ought to have a queen. I do not think there is any trouble about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am through with the point I was making, and I want to take up the next point. We Democrats commit ourselves in this bill to a prohibitive-tariff policy, being a party pledged against the existing tariff system. I have heard of paradoxes in my life, but that is the chief. In the very hour when we propose it we see in every paper that comes forth the statement that the Secretary of State of the United States, and the President himself, are making overtures to the other nations with a view to readjusting the tariffs. We here build a wall to heaven in one moment and invite them to cut it down in the next. If that policy is sound, then we, in the enactment of this measure, are destroying that very policy.

Mr. President, that is not all. The bill proposes a tax on commerce between the States after a manner and in a degree without precedent and without parallel in our history. I think I get the meaning of that. This Union has four great bonds. One is the Constitution, one is the Federal courts, one is the banking and currency system, and the other is freedom of commerce between the States. Whenever any one of those bonds is impaired, we are striking a blow at the bonds of the Union. We think it is well entrenched, we think it will last forever, but empires and republics do not fall by force; they fall by disintegration, and they die in the hands of men who do not know they are dying. Their destroyer is not the assassin, not the deliberate man with a stiletto who strikes in the night, but the man who does not think on the meaning of his acts or the import of the legislation which he espouses. That is the way it happens. Starvation will not kill us, but forgetfulness will destroy us.

The taxes proposed in the bill are taxes on commerce between the States; we cannot avoid it that they are. The tax on cotton is a tax on the commerce of the South with the North. The tax on tobacco is a tax on the commerce of North Carolina with the rest of the Union. The tax on wheat is a tax on the West in its commerce with the South. I notice all the way through the bill there runs the little legend, "in the current of interstate commerce." It is there that we undertake to found the tax.

Now hear me, Mr. President and Senators, if we break this country up into tax zones, and if we proceed along a line which will induce a manufacturer to confine his manufactures to his State in order to escape the burden of this tax, it will not make any difference any more whether we call it the American Union or not. If I understand the bill and understand the Constitution and the law, that could be done. The hosiery mill in my State, which sells throughout the Union, could establish a little mill in some fair hamlet in the Commonwealth, buy its yarns within the State, and announce to the Union and to the taxgatherer that it would never sell a pair of hose outside of the bounds of North Carolina. Then its product would not be in the current of interstate commerce, and would not be taxable; and what would we have as a consequence of that? We would destroy the great capital structures which employ the labor of the land, and we would segregate every State into a little commercial empire of its own. That is the fair implication of this bill. We have had enough of nationalism in the world, but this bill looks to a State nationalism.

Again, the bill predicates an unprecedented transfer of both the taxing power and the appropriating power from the Congress, elected by and responsible to the people, to the Secretary of Agriculture. We live in the presence of amazing things. What is proposed? We are not to tell the Secretary what the tax shall be; he is to tell us. We do not even fix the limits of the tax; it is an indefinite tax. That is bad enough.

I never thought we would come to the time when we would let a President of the United States lay a tax upon the American people, but here we are asked to give the power to the Secretary of Agriculture, who never received a vote in his life, and will never have to answer to the people. I say to Senators, that is the beginning of the end of representative government in the United States. If I cannot be represented, if I cannot hold the man who taxes me to answer to me, I have the word of the Constitution itself, and of the Supreme Court, as to what happens. The Supreme Court declares that the only real check on the taxing power is the answerability of the taxing power to the people, and that it will not look behind it. In case after case it has said that. Yet here is a man who does not answer to the people, and here is the end of tax limitation.

Mr. President, that is not the worst of it. The most singular thing to me is that we not only would give him the taxing power, uncontrolled and unchecked, but we would give him the appropriating power. Here is a great fund. None of us knows how much it is; some say $500,000,000, some $800,000,000; I do not know. I will take one or either or both. Who distributes it? The Secretary of Agriculture. Who gets it? Whoever he says gets it. He can take every dollar that is derived from tobacco and give it to the cotton farmer. He can take every dollar derived from cotton and give it to the wheat farmer. He can take every dollar taken from the hog processor and give it to the rice people. There are no limits, no checks, no balances.

I did think, Mr. President, that if anything was secure in the United States, it was the system of checks and balances fixed in the old Constitution. And here we are asked to throw the power to tax and the power to appropriate into the hands of a man who is not responsible to the people. Arbitrary? Uncertain? We will never know how much the tax is to be from one month to the next. It is in his sole discretion.

Mr. President, on top of that, it is proposed to have every industry in the United States which deals with these articles come humbly upon its knees to the Capital here at Washington, crawl the steps of the Department of Agriculture, and ask the Secretary for a license to do business. He says that by means of that license he will make them behave. That is in the testimony here.

Mr. President, I want to know when the American people were looking for a taskmaster. When did we ever get to the point where we would put a man up with the supreme power of taxation, and the supreme power of appropriation, and tell him that we and our fellow citizens do not intend ever again to do business except at his leave and with a license from his hand? That is in the bill.

I spoke just now about liberty, and there is some more to be said about liberty, there is some more to be said about the character of the American Republic. I say, Mr. President, she has a character that was built in the hearts of the fathers. She has a character that was created by 140 years of glorious history; and, when we put a taskmaster over the people, and allow him to lay the taxes which he wishes to lay, and make the appropriations which he wants to make, and issue the licenses he chooses to issue, I say with great lamentation, and I regret to say it, she has lost her character; she is not the old Republic; she is not the ship of state our fathers knew; she is not the vessel to take us through this night and storm.

What further? It is proposed in this bill, Senators, to lay taxes not for the Government and not for public purposes. I have the decisions here, but I am not going to trouble Senators or the RECORD with them. The definition of taxation is so elementary that it never occurred to me that any human being would conceive of taxes in the United States as anything except something for the support of the Government in its public functions as established by the Constitution. We always thought the welfare clause in section 8 and the first paragraph was a limitation on taxation. If this bill goes through and the Supreme Court sustains it, the welfare clause will from thenceforward on be the authority for taxation. That is where we stand, and on that point I should like to make a remark in passing. When we convert the welfare clause into authority for taxes rather than a limitation upon taxes, we have removed the last limit upon the taxing power.

Assume that the tax will come to $600,000,000. It was a courageous thing, it was a great demand made upon the Congress, it was very noble in the President to call upon us to pass the Economy Act. Every man here had to go through it in a sacrificial sort of spirit just as the President did. We thought we had a defense for it. I thought I could go home and tell the boys whose allowances were being cut down, tell the widows whose allowances were being cut down that I was sorry, but that it was a necessity of the great Government which they loved and for which the boys had fought. I thought I could make that argument.

Pass this bill and put $600,000,000 taxes on the consumers of the United States and where is the argument? If it was necessary, in the interest of this hoped-for recovery and the welfare of our Government, to take from 400 to 800 million dollars off the backs of the people, by what reasoning do we propose now calmly to put that tax right back on them and in a worse way than it was before?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCADOO in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I would ask the able Senator from North Carolina if he has had time to make comparisons between the provisions of the pending bill, at which his able address seems to level criticism, with the bill for the establishment of the War Industries Board and the procedure which followed it under the Wilson administration? Where is the difference between the two?

Mr. BAILEY. I must say that I have not made that comparison, and I would not undertake to make a comparison of this measure with any other measure growing out of conditions existing during the World War. I think some of us have gotten into a strange state of confusion in that we argue many things here in time of peace as if we were in a state of war. The war acts are not precedents.

Mr. LEWIS. May I not ask the eminent Senator from North Carolina if in the present condition of this country and the needs and demands of its people the situation is not parallel to that which exists in time of war?

Mr. BAILEY. I answer the Senator by saying by no means, and perhaps it is the opposite. America was prosperous during the war; we were making money as we rarely had ever made it. Cotton was selling at $200 a bale during the war; it is selling now at $30 a bale. There never was such a tide of prosperity in any land as we had during the war. This is a depression, and present economic conditions are entirely opposite from those which then prevailed. I hear men say that our present situation is worse than war. It may be, but granted that it is worse than war, how does that argue that precedents under the National Defense Act, when the Government really has supreme power, the Constitution not being abrogated but concentrating on defense, all authority being thrown into the saving of the country against insurrection or the invader, justify us in similar measures in time of peace when we are confronted by economic problems and difficulties?

Mr. LEWIS. May I take the liberty to refresh my mind or find myself in error? The high price of cotton at the time to which the Senator alludes was not because it was cotton but because as cotton it was a constituent element of munitions of war.

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the Senator's pardon. Wheat went up practically in the same way, and the Government had to stop its rise.

Mr. LEWIS. The rise in the case of wheat was due to a similar cause, that it was a necessity for all the soldiers engaged in the war, which made a larger demand than ordinarily.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I will go farther, and say that land went up in the same way.

Mr. LEWIS. That was because it produced the wheat, as well as the cotton.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. Poultry went up in the same way; beef went up in the same way.

Mr. LEWIS. May I not ask the Senator if it was not the exigency of war that caused it?

Mr. BAILEY. I have no doubt that the war was the underlying cause. I am not dealing with that difficulty at all, but am simply trying to answer the suggestion as to cotton.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator if in time of peace we may not take the doctrine of taxation, to which he addressed himself in the way of criticism, laid down in the Oleomargarine case? Did not the Government in that case adopt the method and exact form of taxation now proposed, and was it not sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. I realize that that act was sustained, as a number of other acts of similar character were sustained, and that they may be, in some sense of the word, in the nature of precedents, but by no means can we make the leap from the tax on oleomargarine or from the decision in the Oleomargarine case to the pending measure which seeks to put taxes not on articles such as oleomargarine, not as contrasted with some other articles, but to put taxes upon articles enumerated, ranging from 33 to 150 percent; and not for the support of the Government, not as a matter of inspection, not as a matter of preventing the sale of a deleterious article, but wholly as a matter of revenue for the purposes of public distribution or group distribution. I think there is a very wide difference.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator does not recognize, then, that this tax is proposed to be levied for the benefit of the Government in order that the Government may preserve its citizens.

Mr. BAILEY. I would very greatly restrict that. I just made some remarks on the welfare clause apropos of just what the Senator is saying; but the tax here proposed is not a tax for the Government; it does not go to the Government. The Government collects it and agrees on the face of the bill to send it, distribute it to a certain group.

The Government's functions are described in the Constitution. We are all familiar with what the Government has to do. This is not a governmental tax in that sense at all. This is a tax to gather a bounty to be paid to the farmers at the will of the Secretary of Agriculture as he may say when, how, and how much. It does not relate at all to the functions of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, we crown the whole structure with a marvelous bureaucracy. Here is the Democratic Party, which went out on ten thousand stumps in 1930 and 1932 and brought down all the curses of heaven upon bureaucracy everywhere. Now look at the one which will follow the enactment of this bill. We have some bureaus in Washington; we have had some before; but under the one now proposed, every industry is answerable to the Secretary of Agriculture; every farmer is dependent upon him, and there is a horde—how many I cannot estimate; 30,000, 50,000, 100,000—of agents, inspectors, collectors, and accountants, going forth to run agriculture and the industry of the land, all of it answerable to a bureau at Washington, and a bureau not elected by the people.

I think it was a former Senator, James A. Reed, of Missouri, who described the officeholders under the Republican administration as more multitudinous than the lice of Egypt and more pestiferous than the frogs and grasshoppers that drove Pharaoh to desperation. I invoke his spirit when we are about to create this bureau, the spirit of one who stood for simplicity of government, who denounced bureaus, and strove to reduce their number.

Mr. President, I have given my reasons. I am going to sum up just a little now by saying that, while I feel, in all probability, the bill will pass, I am comforted by two facts: One is that the President himself claims nothing for the bill and he promises to revoke it after the damage has been done; if it proves a failure, he will be the first to come into court and take it back. But it does not do a dead man's friends much good to have the doctor come in and admit his mistake.

The other thing that comforts me more than that is this: I know that the common judgment of the Senate of the United States is against this bill. I may appear to vote with the minority, but my heart will be with the hearts of the majority. I have never since I have been here heard a bill advocated on this floor with less enthusiasm and denounced in the cloakrooms with more ardor than this one has been. Somebody ought to go up to the White House, and, with great respect and with utter friendship such as I have for the President, tell him in solemn truth that that is the fact.

Mr. President, I read the moving story the other day of that disaster in the air, the wreck of the Akron. The testimony in the court of inquiry was very simple. The discipline was perfect; the men on board were strong, noble men; the captain was a good captain, and the admiral himself was there. They were not wanting in brains; they were not wanting in courage; and it seemed to me a tragic sort of thing that that majestic ship and those seventy-odd men, caught in a storm that appeared to surround them on every side, should, by some strange fatality, take precisely the wrong direction at precisely the moment of destruction. The whole explanation, Mr. President, of the wreck of the Akron is that instead of going west the ship turned east, was caught in the center of the storm, and in the twinkling of an eye all was lost. I have, Mr. President, some sense of responsibility here. After 45 months of struggle with the great storm that sweeps our country, and in a great measure all the world, with its darkness and its night, I have some sense of the crucial character of the hour, and I have a profound feeling that it cannot last forever; it cannot last much longer; and if now we take the wrong direction, who can answer for the consequences?

I have sometimes thought lately, Mr. President, that there might be on the skies a little cloud the size of a man's hand, from which we could take hope that the long drought is to pass. If I may change the figure, I have read the newspapers recently of the increase in carloadings; I have seen the price of cotton a little stimulated; I have seen price of hogs rising just a little; I have seen the price of wheat leap rather remarkably and corn even more remarkably. As I read the figures of commerce, I said, "Well, after all, the tide that left us in 1929, that swept out in such a flood and so far to sea and left the shores with us upon them, so dark, drear, and forbidding; the tide that swept so far and left all of us in such a dread and hopeless state must again return"; and I thought that in these prices I could see the little silvery ripple, such as one may mark along the shoreline of our Atlantic, and marking, note a freshness and a color there that tells us at last the tide has turned, and hour by hour will rise until it floods again and all the dark and forbidding shore be swept with light and joy. It is not beyond the possibilities, Mr. President, that after 45 months, nearly 4 years, of ebbing tide we stand now at the return of the flood, and if we do, and then a fatal mistake shall be made, neither ourselves nor those who come after us will ever be able to justify it or make a sufficient apology for our existence.

So, Mr. President, I come now to the point of the better remedy, as I promised the Senator from Texas I would. Is there a better remedy? Is there a remedy in America available to the Congress and to the American people which will meet the demands of $11,000,000,000 of debts and from 250 to 1,000 percent increase in taxes? Is there a hope that the farmers of America can make such profits on their harvest as will enable them to pay their debts? That has been the problem from the outset. I know that I am going to tread on dangerous ground, but I am going to tread carefully.

I read the report of the committee. The committee was not satisfied with the bill. The committee dared to utter the word "inflation", and I wondered at its courage. I think we have fallen under a misapprehension on that subject. I am not an advocate of inflation in the wild or incontinent and foolish sense, and no other man in the possession of his senses could be. We have here in the library, and I have read a great deal of it, the story of inflation in Belgium and France and England and Germany following the conclusion of the Great War. The German inflation was a deliberate plan of a deeply indebted and hysterical government, indebted to its own people, to extinguish as rapidly as possible its debts. It was a policy of wreck and ruin, and while there have arisen in Germany since then some 25 political parties and there have been many campaigns, every party in every campaign has stated as a principal plank in its platform that there shall be no such inflation as that.

When men talk to me about inflation in those terms, I think of the German experience. I have heart that there can be a measure of regulation of our currency of the dollar value—no longer the gold value, but the dollar value now, for we are off the gold standard. There can be a measure of regulation, I think within the laws now on the books. That will not be inflation in the German sense, which we all abhor, but will correct the course of the deflation that has ruined us all. Tell me the plummet sank 6 feet below level whereas it should have been 6 feet above, and I might at least have the right to bring the plummet back to the level.

Here are the conditions now existing in our land for that sort of inflation—I mean now in the sense that the President used when he uttered the expression, "Sound and adequate currency." Here are the conditions: The floating debt of our Treasury today is approaching $7,000,000,000. That debt will never be funded except by inflationary methods. It cannot be done. The power is not here. The realities are not here. Congress has appropriated $500,000,000 for relief of the destitute to be paid probably within a year. We have in the bill now before us $2,000,000,000 for refinancing the farmer. We have another bill for refinancing the home owners on a different plan, but calling for considerable money. Altogether, the American Republic is face to face with the fact that it has to handle something like $10,000,000,000 of floating debt. That is what it will be—not a dollar from the taxpayer as such, but all from the taxpayer in the long run, to be sure.

If we should move in that direction—and we have got to do it sooner or later—if we will come to meet that situation in the only manner in which it can be met, we will have all the inflation as the crops come in that is necessary to restore prices to a reasonable normalcy. We will cut down the debts, cut down the taxes, and lift the commodity values. There is no trouble about that. Walter Lippmann, the publicist, was denouncing that sort of thing 3 months ago, and in last Sunday's paper he is advocating it. Arthur Salter, the economist of the League of Nations for 12 years, and recognized as probably the foremost of all the economists of Great Britain, had an article in the New York Times of last Sunday in which he attributes the improved condition in England to precisely that sort of inflation—a drop in the pound value with which we are all familiar.

Adam Smith, the father of political economy and to whom we can look, notwithstanding many events and many changes, with more assurance even now than we ever could look to anybody that has written since, has laid down in his book, The Wealth of Nations, that it is always in the power of a king or government to regulate money and to increase prices. It must be controlled. It must be held in hand. It is held in hand in England. It is held in hand in France. It is held in hand in Germany. It is being held in hand in the United States of America at this moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator know of a single historical instance where the commodity prices were ever forced up in any way save through the inflation of currency in some manner such as has been indicated?

Mr. BAILEY. I take the point of the suggestion; but when I come to tell what I know about anything so broad, I hesitate to make a statement.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask the Senator if he is not acquainted with many efforts during the last two or three thousand years to force prices up by some method of legislation such as we are now considering, but does the Senator know of any instance when it ever succeeded permanently?

Mr. BAILEY. No, I do not think we could predicate anything by saying with a view to a permanent and lasting set-up. I am not dealing with that, and the bill is not dealing with it. I am dealing with the immediate necessity of enabling producers of raw material, the providential wealth of our land, for that is what it really is, to receive a return from their products comparable to the return they received before the infernal deflation set in. I am trying to correct it. I do think that we can strike a balance that will be, so far as you and I are concerned, a permanent thing, but I am not going to guarantee a great deal for any great period of years, because I know that is a vain undertaking in a world like this.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it not the opinion of the Senator that we can accomplish all that it is sought to accomplish by this bill and by other similar bills now pending by an inflation or expansion of the currency? Is not that the only feasible and sensible way to increase commodity prices?

Mr. BAILEY. That is just what I am urging.

Mr. LOGAN. I am agreeing with the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I am saying we cannot guarantee permanently anything of that sort, and I am not going to try to guarantee permanency in anything in a world that is as temporal as this one.

Mr. LOGAN. About the only thing that is permanent is human misery, and that has always been with us. We have been trying to correct it throughout the ages, but so far it appears we have not made very much progress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think any great increase in currency without its being employed in commercial and industrial activities would be of much avail?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me interrupt the Senator. I am not subscribing merely to the quantitative theory of currency. That is only part of it. I spoke of the $10,000,000,000 that we will have to raise in one way or another, and that will go into circulation. We have to have not only quantity, but we have to have circulation, and then we have to have velocity of circulation. I would not give a straw for $100,000,000,000 of paper dollars stuck down yonder in the Treasury. I want to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Simply an increase in the quantity of currency, unless there is some method to get it into the hands of the people in some legitimate way, would be of no assistance. Of course velocity of circulation has as much to do with it as the quantity of the money outstanding.

Mr. BAILEY. It is like a river. If the river does not run, it is a pond. The minute it begins to run, it is a river, and the faster it runs the more power there is in the river.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. We have an illustration at hand. Many banks today have larger resources and a larger amount of currency than they ever possessed, but it does not flow out into the channels of trade and commerce. It does not add to the happiness, prosperity, or production of the American people. What we need is a safe and sound currency, an adequate currency, a currency that will be used in industry and employment to furnish work for the great masses of the people.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator. The sooner the money piled up in the banks gets into circulation in profitable enterprise, and no other, the better for the country. I could make a speech at this point on that subject, but I am not going to detain the Senate. I am simply going to say that as long as the Senate of the United States—and I say it with every respect—pursues a policy that is always threatening business and industry, we cannot hope that human beings will put their money into those institutions. They will hide it in the vaults; and when the vaults give way, they will bury it in the ground, and they will be wise to do it. I say that with great emphasis, but it should be so said.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. In speaking, however, of the protection of business, would the Senator make that superior to the happiness of the great masses of the people which must likewise be protected?

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad the Senator asked that question. The happiness of the American people is always dependent upon the prosperity of enterprise. May I say to the Senator from Kentucky that it is not a mere matter of which one of the two we seek to make happy. If I had the magic wand to make a million children happy, I would rather do it than to make the Senator from Kentucky happy, and he would be glad for me to make that choice. But that is not the question here. Will the Senate hear me when I say this? The number of men employed is always measured by the number of dollars invested.

Mr. LOGAN. I assent to that. That is true.

Mr. BAILEY. All right. Now, if we want to make the unemployed man happy, or the employed man happy, let us follow a course in this Congress that will make men feel like putting their money into enterprises. We now tax them out of confidence, we ask them to build factories and then make it impossible for them to succeed. We fix prices, we limit hours, we regulate, and pile on the taxes. I do not wonder that they seek the ways and means of extricating their capital from such a situation, lest it be taken from them.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not believe the Senator means to say that capital should resent the attempts of Congress to pass laws regulating the activities of capital. I do not believe the Senator means to convey the idea that the Senate and the Congress ought to keep their hands off big industry and capital, and make no attempt to restrain it, and prevent its exploiting the poor.

Mr. BAILEY. I am satisfied with the Senator's statement. I do not mean to say anything foolish while I am in the possession of my senses. That would be foolish for anybody to say.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator think there have not been many who have advocated in the past, and many who are advocating now that we ought never to touch the big business of the country, that money is sacred, and that Congressmen and Senators have not sense enough to legislate about big financial institutions? There are many who believe that; many adhere to it, and many preach it, but I cannot agree to any such doctrine as that.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sorry that the memory of the Senator is so short, and that my speech is so long. It has not been long since I was saying that it had been one of the supreme efforts of the English-speaking people to prevent monopolies and unreasonable restraints upon trade. I will go with the Senator anywhere for a reasonable and a righteous supervision of the Government over commerce. We have that. I hate fraud, and I will stay the hand of greed, and you will, too. But——

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish, if you please. But that is quite a different proposition from the proposition now, and the proposition of the last several years, I may say, which has kept practically every business man in America in terror of the tax gatherer and the meddler. We know about that.

The Senator asked me if I was encouraging capital not to invest money. The feeble words I might say would serve no purpose. I am telling you now that nobody will invest money in a land where the Government tells you how long a man shall work, threatens to fix his wages, and leaves the employer to the mercies of the politician to get a return on his capital. No, sir! I think one of the great points in the turn of the tide of this depression would be the adoption by the United States Government of a policy that would induce men who have money—I do not mean especially the rich man, but the man with $500, or the man with $10,000, or the man with a million dollars—that would induce them to put it out, and give them some assurance that if they did it would not be taken up with taxation and regulation.

Now I am glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senator made one statement that interested me greatly. I desire to ask him if he feels that he is accurate in that statement. Perhaps I misunderstood him; but I believe he stated that the number of men employed in industry is proportionate to the investment.

Mr. BAILEY. In direct ratio; yes.

Mr. BONE. In the light of what is now happening in the world of industry in the perfection of machinery, I wonder if the Senator feels that that is a wholly accurate statement.

Not long ago I walked into a factory where 10,000 men formerly had been employed in the process of producing automobile frames. I saw those men supplanted by the introduction of a great machine by means of which now 200 men turn out these 10,000 automobile frames. I have seen the same process employed in the production of hydroelectric energy. I have seen the step-up, the increase in the tempo of production, within the past few years. It has become the outstanding phenomenon of our industrial life; and I wondered if the Senator really meant his statement in that way.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator that he is going to see a great deal more of it. The more we meddle with business the more it is going to be induced to employ machines rather than men. The effect of the 30-hour law that we passed the other day is going to be to put the man with capital to the necessity of getting some sort of a machine that is not subject to any laws, that can run all night and all day—and, unfortunately, we have that sort of machines in the world now.

I will answer the Senator, however. The statement I made was simply the old statement of political economy that I do not know has ever been challenged. I do not think the Senator here meant to challenge it. This is the formula: The number of men employed is in direct ratio to the amount of capital invested.

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, wait. I see the Senator is going to spring, but probably I can anticipate somewhat. I know that with the development of machinery and the bringing in of motors the ratio as of the time prior to that must undergo a readjustment; but in the new condition the same rule applies with the same force.

Now, hear me further:

How could men be employed if capital were not invested? How could a man work in a mill if somebody had not subscribed to its stock? How could a man work in a print shop if somebody were not running it with capital? Why, it is self-evident. How could a man build a house as a carpenter unless somebody were back there with capital to pay him his wages? And, of course, if you go into the philosophy of it, you will find that the capital is the wage working in one way and the worker is working to make the wage in the other way, and both are working together and neither wanes without the other.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BLACK. First with reference to the suggestion of the Senator that a reduction of hours will increase the use of machinery, may I state to the Senator that it is a formula as well known and perhaps better supported than the one to which he has referred that in times of depression, when people are out of work, the improvement of machinery is more greatly accelerated than at any other time. But, now, with reference to the formula which the Senator mentions, that the employment of men is directly in proportion to the investment of capital——

Mr. BAILEY. Always in direct ratio; yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK. At the present time we have enough shoe factories in the United States to manufacture 900,000,000 pairs of shoes in a year. The most we have ever sold is 300,000,000 pairs. Does there not have to be an explanation of the formula to which the Senator refers?

Mr. BAILEY. There might be, but I think——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me answer the Senator at that point.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to add just this——

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to answer the question, may it please the Senator, that he has asked.

Mr. BLACK. I have not finished it.

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator may ask two questions then and I will answer two at once. Go right ahead.

Mr. BLACK. By reason of the fact that today all over America every factory, every type of business, is overbuilt, instead of the employment of men being in direct ratio to the amount of invested capital, the exact opposite has occurred. Because capital has invested more of the products of labor and capital than it should it has thereby deprived labor of its purchasing power which could have been used to purchase the output of factories, and now the factories themselves find that they cannot employ men in direct ratio to the amount of invested capital.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not exactly get the Senator's question. It is just a remark, but I will respond to the remark.

I am well aware of the state of facts that the Senator states. I raise no question about it. Here is, say, a cotton mill worth $5,000,000. There is that much capital invested. The Senator argues that because that cotton mill has $5,000,000 invested, therefore the thing should run and employ men. The Senator was simply saying, just now, that there were a lot of idle mills in the country, and a lot of unemployed people; that capital was invested, and still was not employing anyone. That is what I understood he meant by his remarks. I am willing to be cleared up if I have misapprehended what the Senator said.

Mr. BLACK. What I meant was that it was impossible to state that the employment of men now was in direct ratio to the amount of invested capital or dollars, by reason of the fact that there is an overinvestment of capital in manufacturing enterprises.

Mr. BAILEY. There may be. I will agree that there may be an overinvestment; but that does not affect the rule.

Mr. BLACK. And therefore that the rule cannot apply, by reason of the fact that there would be more men employed today if there had been less money taken from labor to invest in overbuilding machinery and factories, and more of it left to the men to buy the products of the factories. So that the rule cannot fit modern conditions today with reference to the overbuilding of factories.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, neither this rule nor any other rule that I know of should be expected to fit momentary or passing conditions. The whole principle of life is one of variation and exception; but let us get this matter straight.

The capital invested and not employing today is what is troubling the Senator's mind. It is true that capital is invested, but it is gone. The value went. It has shrunk.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish. I should like to answer one question, and then I will yield to the Senator for another.

When the shrinkage in the value of capital structures occurred in America, the Senator must realize that by a fair estimation more than $100,000,000,000 were withdrawn from investment and disappeared as completely as Banquo's ghost, and that has as much to do with unemployment as anything I know of.

Now, wait. I know the Senator is going to say that one came first, and the other second. Let that go. I will not undertake to discuss that. Whether the hen laid the egg or the egg hatched the hen is an interminable question. I prefer not to get into that. We are dealing with the principles of political economy. We return right back to the proposition that nothing employs labor to any great extent except money invested; and the more the money invested the more the men are employed. I should think that would be so elementary that no question would ever be raised about it; for, as I said just now, on what basis is a human being employed in this world except on the basis of an investment of capital? Even the farmer has to invest capital, and even the tenant farmer has to go on the farmer's invested capital. I think you will find that that applies all the way down. What I am saying is that I have no patience with a line of political action and thinking at a time like this which advises men they must not borrow money because if they do they will lose it, and they must not put it in any investment, whether land or houses or mills, or the tax gatherer will get it. I am not asking people to hoard. I am not advocating that; but when men hide their money away under circumstances of that sort I can but admire their prudence.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the able Senator fully in a part of what he has said, that capital will not be invested unless there is some hope of obtaining a profit in our capitalistic system.

Mr. BAILEY. I am in favor of the capitalistic system. I am glad to say that.

Mr. BLACK. So am I.

Mr. BAILEY. This is the system we have, and I am glad the Senator is in favor of it.

Mr. BLACK. I am not in favor of the abuses which have grown up, and I am not willing to sit silent and permit the capitalistic system to destroy itself by reason of a blind adherence to old forms.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps the capitalistic system might be heard now and then to cry out, "God save us from our friends."

Mr. BLACK. I think the Senator is correct; I think it could cry out in loud tones, "God save us from our friends who are not willing to recognize that abuses are destroying it and eating at the very vitals and fundamentals of our Government."

What I started to say was this: There is no question about the sufficiency of the money in the banks, as the Senator has said, if it can be invested in some place where it can be utilized to the profit of the investors. But in what particular line of industry is it to be invested? If we must permit people to work others 15 hours a day, or 12, or 16, or whatever they want to work them, where may money be invested in any factory where the industry is not overbuilt? The cotton factories are overbuilt, the hosiery mills are overbuilt, the shoe factories are overbuilt, every other line of endeavor in this country is overbuilt. Therefore until there is some operation whereby the purchasers may buy the output of the factories so that more money needs to be invested, of course industries cannot expand. So I say that today the number of people at work is by no means in direct ratio to the amount of capital invested in business. It cannot be, because there is all that surplus capital that has been invested in business which cannot sell its products.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator rose to ask me a question, and he has made several affirmations and no interrogatory, so I feel I ought to thank him for his commentary.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACK. I am glad to have added to the Senator's remarks.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very much obliged.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I want to make this suggestion to the Senator, that the rule to which he has adverted about the investment of capital and the employment of labor is perfectly sound, and no one can dispute it. But I believe it should be modified, and probably has always been, and that is understood, that it implies capital wisely invested and not capital that is unwisely invested.

Mr. BAILEY. I should say there that the rule would be, if the Senator wants to make it very strict, that it implies capital profitably invested.

Mr. LOGAN. That would be better. Then one other thing, and I will not trouble the Senator any further. I simply desire to remind the Senator that the trouble with Banquo's ghost was that it would not disappear, instead of not appearing, as suggested.

Mr. BAILEY. I would say that this is the first human being I have seen who has seen it. I was very much amazed. I thought he had finally disappeared. But perhaps he walks the watches of the night in Kentucky, certainly not elsewhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I said just now that I was for the capitalistic system. I wish to make that perfectly clear. I did not intend to dwell on it. The American system is not essentially the capitalistic system. Capitalism in America is an incident of the character of the Government. Capitalism is an incident of liberty. I am for the liberty system. Individualism implies capitalism. Collectivism destroys both liberty and capital. I think that ought to be very simply said and very easily understood.

When I attach myself to the right of personal security, to the right of personal property, to the right of personal liberty, I lay the foundations of the individualistic system, and one of the incidents of that system is capitalism. We have to make a choice in the United States. I think sometimes we are pretty close to it. We are closer to it than we suspect. We have to choose in this land whether this will be a collectivism Government negativing the liberties, or an individualistic Government affirming the liberties. The Constitution, thank God, still affirms the liberties.

Mr. President, I do not read the preamble of the Constitution for nothing.

To secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

I think I know what that means. That does not stop with the writers of that Constitution. That stretches through 3,000 years, culminating and flowering in the English civilization first. I could go back to Cicero himself in the Roman Senate, who cried out, "Preserve, O Romans, the liberties which the fathers have won for our inheritance."

Mr. President, I have finished. I am very grateful to the Senators who have listened to me and discussed the matter with me. I wish to come very quickly to my conclusion.

The pending bill strikes at the character of the Government. It serves no good purpose for the farmer. It is an impossibility which contradicts itself; an anachronism.

I feel that it is a very solemn thing for us here, in the springtime, and knowing that the harvest is to come next fall, to set out upon a course which would do nothing for the farmer when he gathers his wheat or picks his cotton or grades his tobacco. I should like to go a way that would mean something for him. I would rather do that than anything I know. But next to that and in its way above that, incomparably above it all, I think we have the character of the Republic at stake in this series of measures we are carrying on here and considering, and I think this one vitally strikes at the character of our Republic.

Mr. President, I conclude with just one remark. It was just about a hundred years ago in this city that Andrew Jackson was President of the United States. It was a troubled time. At a banquet his friends proposed to him a toast, not knowing what he would say, the toast being "The American Union." The President, the soldier, the patriot, answered, "It must be preserved."

I propose another toast to America, to the Senate: "The character of the American Union: it must be preserved."

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE HAROLD LOUDERBACK

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 12:30 o'clock having arrived, the Senate is now sitting as a court in the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives were announced, and they were conducted by the secretary to the minority to the seats assigned them.

The respondent, Harold Louderback, accompanied by his counsel, Walter H. Linforth, Esq., and James M. Hanley, Esq., entered the Chamber and took the seats assigned them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal of the proceedings of the last session of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback will now be read.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of the previous sitting of the court be dispensed with, and that the Journal be approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chair lays before the court a resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolution (H.Res. 108) was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
April 17, 1933.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted an amendment to article 5 of the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And, also, that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House, any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Have the managers on the part of the House any suggestions to offer?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President—

Amendment to article 5 of the articles of impeachment by the House of Representatives exhibited against Harold Louderback, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of California:

Article 5 is amended to read as follows——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment unless the managers on the part of the House desire to do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, with no intention to violate any rule of procedure, and affirming the greatest respect for the honorable managers on the part of the House and the honorable attorneys on the part of the respondent, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amended article, or the article made definite and certain, be dispensed with for this reason: The honorable managers on the part of the House have caused to be printed at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, and it appears on our desk today, the amended article in extenso; and tomorrow morning the appropriate officers of the Senate will reprint the said amended pleading in the pamphlets which will be placed on our desks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none.

The amended article is as follows:

AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 5 OF THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES EXHIBITED AGAINST HAROLD LOUDERBACK, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES IN AND FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Article 5 is amended to read as follows:

"It is intended by article 5 to charge, and it is charged, that the reasonable and probable result of Harold Louderback's action in his capacity as judge in making decisions and orders in actions pending in his court and before him as said judge and by the method of appointing receivers and attorneys for receivers, by appointing incompetent receivers and attorneys, by his relationship and transactions with one Sam Leake, and by the relationship and transactions of the said Sam Leake with such appointees of the said respondent made possible and probable by the action and attitude of the said Harold Louderback, and by displaying a high degree of indifference to the interest of estates and parties in interest in receiverships before him and his court, and by displaying a high degree of interest in making it possible for certain individuals and firms to derive large fees from the funds of such estates, has been to create a general condition of wide-spread fear and distrust and disbelief in the fairness and disinterestedness of the official actions of the said Harold Louderback, and to create by his said acts, deeds, and relationships, contrary to his individual and official duty, a favorable condition and a cause for the development naturally and inevitably of rumors and suspicions destructive of public confidence in and respect for the said Harold Louderback as an individual and a judge to the scandal and disrepute of his said court and the administration of justice therein and prejudicial generally to the public respect for and public confidence in the Federal judiciary. Wherefore, the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

"It is hereby alleged and charged that the conduct of said Harold Louderback, as alleged in articles 1, 2, 3, and 4, and as hereinafter alleged, in its general and aggregate result has been such as reasonably and probably calculated to destroy public confidence insofar as he and his court are concerned in that degree of disinterestedness and fidelity to judicial duty and responsibility which the public interest requires shall be held by the people in the Federal courts and in those who administer them, and which for a Federal judge to hurt or destroy is a crime and misdemeanor of the highest order;

"First, specifying as indicative of and disclosing the character and judicial attitude of said Harold Louderback revealed by his acts and official conduct to the people among whom he has jurisdiction, and the cause for the loss of public confidence of the bar and people of the northern district of California and particularly of the city of San Francisco, where the principal business of such court is transacted, on or about December 19, 1929, the said Harold Louderback appointed one Guy H. Gilbert receiver of the Sonora Phonograph Co., a going concern extensively engaged in the business of receiving and distributing radios and phonographs, the said Guy H. Gilbert being a personal and political friend of the said Harold Louderback, and an intimate friend and financial contributor to one Sam Leake, hereinafter referred to, the said Harold Louderback knowing at the time of such appointment that the whole training and experience of the said Guy H. Gilbert had been as operator and employee of a telegraph company, and the said Harold Louderback at the time of such appointment knowing with certainty that the said Guy H. Gilbert was without qualification to discharge the duties of such receivership, that the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback without regard to the interest of such estate in receivership and in disregard thereof and of the interest of creditors and parties in interest and in violation of the official duty of the said Harold Louderback. That the said Gilbert after said appointment continued in his regular and usual duties and employment as employee of said telegraph company, drawing his accustomed salary during his employment of approximately 6 months as such receiver and received for such services from the funds of the estate of said Sonora Phonograph Co. the sum of $6,800, all of which facts became the subject of newspaper comments and matters of common knowledge throughout and beyond the northern judicial district of California, to the hurt of public confidence in the said Harold Louderback, judge of said court, and to the hurt and standing of the Federal judiciary. It also became a matter of newspaper comment in connection with that receivership matter and others, that theretofore, about 1925 or 1926, the said Gilbert had been appointed by the said Harold Louderback when the said Harold Louderback was a judge of the Superior Court of California, an appraiser of certain real estate, the said Harold Louderback well knowing at the time of such appointment that the said Gilbert was without any qualification to appraise the value of such real estate, and in truth the said Gilbert never saw said real estate and that the said Gilbert did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate, only signing the report which was presented to him, for which services he was allowed the sum of $500.

"The said Gilbert was also theretofore appointed receiver by Harold Louderback in the Stempel-Cooley case in 1929, bankruptcy, collecting during 3 or 4 months $12,000 rents for which he was allowed a fee of $500. In this matter, after conversation with the said Sam Leake, the said Gilbert appointed as his attorney one John Douglas Short, who was an employee in the law office of Erskine & Erskine.

"The said Short was afterward, in March 1931, appointed attorney by one H. B. Hunter, receiver in what is known in this proceeding as the "Russell-Colvin Co. case", and which will hereinafter be specified with reference to. In the said Russell-Colvin case the said H. B. Hunter, having been appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback, at the suggestion of the said Sam Leake, who theretofore had suggested to the said Gilbert the appointment of the said John Douglas Short in the Stempel-Cooley case, and the said H. B. Hunter, after his appointment as such receiver, appointed the said John Douglas Short as his attorney in said Russell-Colvin case, the said Harold Louderback allowing the said John Douglas Short the sum of $50,000 on account as attorney for said receiver, H. B. Hunter.

"Preceding the appointment of the said H. B. Hunter in the said Russell-Colvin case the said Harold Louderback had appointed one Addison G. Strong to be receiver therein, who, because he would not designate as his attorney the said John Douglas Short, as claimed by the said Addison G. Strong, or either the said John Douglas Short or certain other attorneys, as claimed by the said Harold Louderback, the said Addison G. Strong was summarily dismissed as receiver and the said Hunter appointed in his stead, who, on the same day of his said appointment as receiver by the said Harold Louderback, tendered to the said John Douglas Short the attorneyship in said receivership matter.

"On the 25th day of March 1931 one W. L. Hathaway, father-in-law of the said John Douglas Short, advanced as a loan to the said Sam Leake the sum of $1,000 in cash, and 2 days thereafterward the said John Douglas Short, in an involved family transaction, paid to the said W. L. Hathaway, from the compensation received as attorney in the Russell-Colvin Co. matter, the sum of $5,000. Three months later the said Hathaway gave to the said Leake the further sum of $250.

"When the said Harold Louderback appointed the said H. B. Hunter, as aforesaid, receiver in the said Russell-Colvin Co. case at the suggestion of the said Sam Leake, and the said Hunter in turn appointed the said John Douglas Short attorney for him in the Russell-Colvin Co. case, he, the said Harold Louderback, resided at the Fairmont Hotel in a room registered and held in the name of the said Sam Leake, such arrangement being effected in conspiracy between the said Harold Louderback and Sam Leake to aid the said Harold Louderback in carrying out a certain plan and design, the said Harold Louderback pretending to reside in Contra Costa County, while actually and in fact residing in the city of San Francisco at the Fairmont Hotel in a room registered in the name of the said Sam Leake, the purpose and design of which arrangement having to do with the possible venue of a legal action which the said Harold Louderback contemplated might be brought against him. To further strengthen and add color to this pretended residence in Contra Costa County the said Harold Louderback registered as a voter in said Contra Costa County in violation of the laws of California, all of which transactions by the acts and conduct of the said Harold Louderback are involved in and mixed up with the official status and standing and transactions of the said Harold Louderback and are known to the people of the northern district of California and beyond such district to the disgrace and discredit of his office and to the hurt of public confidence therein and of the Federal judiciary. Thereby, as a result of such transactions, putting himself under obligation to, dependent upon, and under the influence of the said Sam Leake in a manner and to a degree utterly inconsistent with that required by the public interest of a Federal judge, and thereby putting himself, the said Harold Louderback, in an attitude with regard to obedience to law and the rights granted to litigants by the law and with regard to the standards of open candid conduct necessary to preserve for the public official that respect and confidence required by the public interest within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution requiring of Federal judges good behavior as a condition upon which their tenure of office depends. That said conduct is bad behavior and constitutes a forfeiture of the right of the said Harold Louderback to hold his the said office of judge of the northern district of California.

"In August 1931 the said Harold Louderback, without a hearing, upon a petition verified by an attorney 'upon information and belief' and without bond of indemnity, granted an equity receivership for the Prudential Holding Co., a concern engaged in extensive real-estate transactions, and appointed the said Guy H. Gilbert as receiver, who in turn designated Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys. The first information the company had of the matter was when Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel appeared in the office of said Prudential Holding Co. to take charge of its affairs. The petition filed without truth or justification was resisted by said Prudential Holding Co., but the said Harold Louderback refused to dismiss the equity receivership matter until an application for receivership in bankruptcy was applied for, which application was based upon the grounds of the said equity receivership wrongfully entertained. The bankruptcy matter fell in the division of Judge St. Sure, one of the judges of the said northern district of California. During the temporary absence of Judge St. Sure the said Harold Louderback, sitting in Judge St. Sure's division, named the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the bankruptcy matter, and 2 days later dismissed the equity receivership. Upon the return of Judge St. Sure to his division, he, Judge St. Sure, promptly dismissed the bankruptcy proceeding because no insolvency was shown. No fees were allowed by Judge St. Sure.

"The proceedings in the matter, and the facts, transactions, and statements therein became a matter of general knowledge within and beyond the said northern district of California, with its reasonable and probable and inevitable consequence to arouse dread and apprehension of the court and judicial power possessed by the said Harold Louderback on the part of the people generally, and particularly of those whose property might be seized upon through the instrumentality of such court, and generally to make said court disrespected and hateful. The said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel had theretofore, and over the protest of the parties in interest on the ground that it was excessive, been allowed a fee of $20,000 by the said Harold Louderback in the Sonora Phonograph Co. case, in which case they had also been associated with the said Gilbert, appointed by the said Harold Louderback as receiver therein.

"Some 6 months after the appointment of the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the said Prudential Holding Co. case, to wit, on the 17th day of February 1932, they were appointed by the said Harold Louderback receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the Fageol Motors Co. case. This company was known in the said northern district of California as one of the more important concerns in that part of the country. It had assets of $3,000,000 book value and liabilities amounting to $1,700,000, with automobile manufacturing, assembling plants, branch offices, properties, and extensive operations in California, Washington, Oregon, and Utah. The said Harold Louderback knew and the people of that community knew at the time the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed as receiver of said Fageol Motors Co. that the said Guy H. Gilbert was utterly without qualifications to discharge the duties of said receivership. That said appointment of said Gilbert and said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel was made in tyrannical and oppressive disregard of the rights and interest of the parties in interest, of the duty to conserve the assets of said company, and in disregard of his duty by the said Harold Louderback to the Government which had commissioned him to be one of its judges. That the facts and circumstances surrounding the appointment of the said Gilbert as receiver and the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel attorneys in said receivership matter and the method of procedure therein on the part of the said Harold Louderback inevitably as a necessary consequence were prejudicial to the judiciary and was to the scandal and disrepute of the court presided over by the said Harold Louderback and to the administration of justice therein, in that the said Fageol Motors Co. getting into financial difficulty the principal creditors of said company and the representatives of said Fageol Motors Co., after full conference and consideration, decided by agreement to apply to the Federal court for a receivership, and after careful consideration agreed upon Edward Fuller, of Oakland, a former official of the Chevrolet Motor Co., with extensive experience and demonstrated business and financial ability not only in the automobile business but in other matters of large proportions. Pursuant to said agreement, on the 17th day of February 1932, the papers were all prepared carrying out the plan agreed upon by Fageol Motors Co. and its creditors and the petition for receiver was filed in the Federal court of the northern district of California. By plan of assignment, determined by drawing numbers from a bag, this matter fell to the said Judge Louderback, there being three judges of said district. The parties in interest, representatives of the company and of the principal creditors, went to his chambers to see the said Judge Louderback with the papers in said matter, arriving shortly before the time for the noon recess of his court, but were advised by the clerk of the said judge that the noon recess would be delayed until 12:30, the said clerk asking what it was desired to see the judge about, and was told that it was the receivership matter of the Fageol Motors Co.; that the persons present represented the company and the larger creditors of said company; and that they had agreed upon Edward Fuller as a proper person for receiver, and to advise the judge of that fact, and that it was desired to discuss the matter with him at 1:30 p.m. At that time the parties in interest returned to see Judge Louderback and were told that Judge Louderback had got off for lunch earlier than anticipated, had some engagement, and would not return until 2:30. At 2:30 the parties in interest returned and were told by the clerk of the said Harold Louderback that Judge Louderback had already appointed the said Gilbert in said matter and that Judge Louderback was not there. In this matter the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were also appointed attorneys for said receiver. The parties in interest, under threat of going into bankruptcy, which action would probably have ousted the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel entirely, effected an agreement with the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel by which other representatives chosen by the said parties in interest were to have effective control of the business and legal matters of the said motors company, the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel offering no obstruction to said representatives. The said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel accepted under the circumstances from the assets of said company the sum of $6,000 and the said Gilbert received approximately the same amount. The facts and circumstances connected with this matter show to the people of said district that the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were not selected by the said Harold Louderback primarily because he deemed the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel best qualified to administer said estate, but resulted in large degree from the desire of the said Harold Louderback to procure for the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel pecuniary benefits from the assets of this concern, which had been driven by financial difficulty to seek the protection of the court of the said Harold Louderback, all of which facts and circumstances received general publicity in the said northern district of California, to the scandal and disrepute of the court of said district, and when taken in connection with the explanation and excuse offered by the said Harold Louderback for the appointment of the said Gilbert as receiver in this matter and in other matters where the public knew the said Gilbert was utterly unqualified that he, the said Harold Louderback, in so appointing the said Gilbert, was acting under the control of a sense of judicial responsibility requiring him to appoint persons known to him of efficiency and integrity to manage the affairs of estates in receivership, which explanation and excuse also has been given wide publicity in said district, the reasonable and necessary and inevitable result of the claim of such high motive under the circumstances was to create the impression and public belief that the said Harold Louderback was attempting by such claim to hide his lack of such actuating motive and to hide his real motive for making such appointments by an insincere and hypocritical claim of having been actuated by them, to the disgust and humiliation of the people of the northern district of California and to the hurt of the public interest.

"In September 1930, in the court of the said Harold Louderback, an equity receivership petition was filed in the Golden State Asparagus case, seeking an economical conduct of the business while its obligations were being adjusted. When the receiver was appointed the said Harold Louderback agreed to submit to said receiver a list of attorneys from which he could name his counsel, but the list was not furnished. Instead the said Harold Louderback designated as attorney for said receiver the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel without reference to the receiver. The legal work connected with the conduct of the receivership was not appreciably more difficult or voluminous than that incident to the ordinary running of the business, which had theretofore cost the business less than $1,000 per year. The said Harold Louderback allowed the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel $14,000 on account, while he denied the uncontested application for $1,500 each, reasonable fees, made by the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant who had performed the only substantial legal services rendered in the case when they prevented a forced sale of the property. These attorneys, in an effort to protect the assets of the said Asparagus Co. had opposed the payment of the fees allowed to Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel on the ground that they were excessive. These acts of said Harold Louderback were well known to the public in and beyond said northern district of California and cumulatively added to the disrespect, apprehension, and public contempt.

"In the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association equity receivership, a Texas insurance corporation doing business in California, the company getting into financial difficulty, the insurance commissioner for the State of California seized the assets of said company in the State of California for the benefit of California policyholders. It was determined as a matter of procedure to ask for an equity receivership with the plan that said insurance commissioner be appointed so as to permit him to continue to hold said assets and administer them without extra cost for a receiver and resultant diminution of the company's California assets. Instead, however, the said Harold Louderback designated one Samuel Shortridge, Jr., as receiver. Thereupon the official of the State of California took proper steps to terminate proceedings in the Federal court. The said Harold Louderback enjoined the insurance commissioner from proceeding under the laws of the State of California. Appeal was taken to the Federal circuit court of appeals and reversal had on the ground of lack of Federal jurisdiction, and the property ordered to be turned over to the officials of California. To this order and mandate of the circuit court of appeals the said Harold Louderback, without any authority of law, imposed a condition that said order and mandate should be complied with provided there be no appeal taken from the order made by him, the said Louderback, allowing a fee of $6,000 to the said Shortridge and his attorney. All of which facts and circumstances became published and known in said northern district of California. By such acts the said Harold Louderback exhibited himself to the public as being willing to obstruct the officials of the State of California in their effort to conserve for citizens of California the assets of said insurance company which they had impounded, willing to assert a jurisdiction which he did not possess, willing to defy a mandate of the circuit court of appeals and attach an illegal and unconscionable condition to said mandate in order to penalize and discourage the exercise of a constitutional right of appeal for the definite and obvious purpose of making sure, so far as possible by such illegal action and coercion, that the said Shortridge and his attorney would be paid from the assets of said insurance company so impounded the fees which he, the said Harold Louderback, had allowed, all to the scandal and discredit of the said Harold Louderback and his court and prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary.

"Wherefore the said Harold Louderback has been and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and has not conducted himself with good behavior."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The fifth article as amended will be printed for the use of the Senate. Are there any further suggestions on the part of the managers of the House?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, we have no further suggestions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do the counsel for the respondent desire to say anything further?

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, we desire an opportunity of answering the amendment, and an opportunity also to make a motion with reference thereto. We will have an answer ready and a motion prepared——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I beg pardon for interrupting the honorable attorney, but my audition is poor, or else the honorable attorney is speaking too low. I do not hear a word, I am sorry to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The counsel on the part of the respondent will permit the Chair to state the request as he understands it.

Counsel for the respondent suggest that they desire an opportunity to respond to the amended article 5, and to submit some pleadings concerning it. Counsel was about to say at what time he thought he would be prepared to offer the pleadings. Counsel will make his further statement.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, we desire to file a motion directed at the amendment to article 5, and also to file an answer in regard to article 5 as thus amended. We shall be prepared to do that by 2 o'clock today, if that will be agreeable to the honorable Senate. We have the motion and the answer ready, but we have not had an opportunity to read them since they were typed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair assumes that counsel on the part of the respondent puts his suggestion in the form of a request.

Mr. LINFORTH. Yes, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Counsel for the respondent requests that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, permit him to file a motion and an answer to article 5, as amended, and states that he will be prepared to do so at 2 o'clock. Will the Senate take order in the matter, or have counsel any further suggestion to make?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, what do the honorable managers on the part of the House have to say as to that?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House have no suggestion to make, except that they have no objection to the suggestion made by counsel for the respondent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senate sitting as a court desire to make any order concerning the matter?

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, take a recess until 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, took a recess until 2 o'clock p.m.

On the expiration of the recess, at 2 o'clock p.m., the Senate, sitting as a court for the trial of articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, resumed its session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore assumed the chair.

The respondent, Judge Harold Louderback, accompanied by his counsel, Walter H. Linforth and James M. Hanley, entered the Chamber and took the seats provided for them.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives were announced and were conducted by the secretary to the majority to the seats assigned to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be pleased to hear from the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, at this time, on behalf of the respondent, Harold Louderback, we tender and ask to be filed his answer to article 5, as amended. Along with that answer we tender a motion to strike out certain portions of article 5, as amended, and ask that that motion likewise be filed. We should like to be heard, Mr. President, a very few moments on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The answer presented by counsel for the respondent to article 5, as amended, and the motion relative to article 5 submitted by counsel will be received and filed.

The answer presented by counsel for the respondent to article 5, as amended, is as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK UPON ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT PRESENTED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Answer of respondent, Harold Louderback, to article 5, as amended, of the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States

ANSWER TO ARTICLE 5, AS AMENDED

For answer to article 5, as amended, the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of said fifth article of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said fifth article, as amended, do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined by the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said fifth article as so amended.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said fifth article, as amended, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said fifth article, as amended, for answer thereto saith:

Further answering said article 5 as so amended, the respondent admits, denies, and alleges as follows:

Respondent denies that the reasonable and probable, or reasonable or probable, result of respondent's action in his capacity of judge in making of any decision or order in any action or actions pending in his court and before respondent as judge thereof, and/or, by any method of appointing any receiver or receivers, or by appointing any alleged incompetent receiver or receivers, or attorney or attorneys, and/or by any relationship or transaction or transactions with W. S. Leake, and/or by any relationship and/or transaction or transactions of said W. S. Leake with any such appointee or appointees of receivers, has made possible and/or probable and/or brought about the alleged condition in the first paragraph of said article 5, as amended, set forth.

Respondent denies that he ever displayed a high degree of indifference, or any degree of indifference to the interest of estates, or any estate, or any party or parties in interest in receiverships before him and in his court.

Respondent denies he ever displayed any such indifference or made it possible for certain and any individual or individuals to derive large fees or any large fee from any such estate or estates.

Respondent denies that any act of his has been to create, or has created, a general or any condition of widespread fear, and/or distrust, and/or disbelief in the fairness and disinterestedness of any of his official acts.

Respondent denies that by any act, deed, or relationship he has created any favorable condition, and/or a cause for the development naturally, inevitably, or at all, of rumors, and/or suspicions destructive of public confidence in and/or respect for respondent as an individual and/or as a judge, to the scandal and/or disrepute of his said court, and/or the administration of justice therein, and/or prejudicial generally, or at all, to the public respect for and/or public confidence in the Federal judiciary.

Respondent denies that he was and/or is guilty of misbehavior as such judge, and denies that he was or is guilty of misdemeanors or any misdemeanor in office.

Respondent denies that any conduct of his as alleged, is or has been as alleged in said article 5, as so amended, and denies that any alleged conduct of his in its general and/or aggregate result has been such as reasonably and probably or reasonably or probably calculated to destroy public confidence, insofar as he or his court is concerned, in that the degree of disinterestedness and/or fidelity to judicial duty and/or responsibility which the public interest requires shall be held by the people in the Federal courts and in those who administer them, and which for a Federal judge to hurt or destroy is a crime and misdemeanor of the highest order.

Answering the allegations of article 5, as amended, insofar as the same relate or refer to Russell-Colvin Co. case, respondent hereby refers to and incorporates herein his answer now on file herein, to article 1 of the articles of impeachment, and further says:

Respondent did not know and never had heard, prior to the inception of these proceedings, that on the 25th day of March 1931, or at any other time, John Douglas Short had given to his father-in-law, W. L. Hathaway, $5,000, or any other sum or amount, from the compensation received by the said John Douglas Short as one of the attorneys for the receiver in the said Russell-Colvin Co. case.

And respondent denies that at any time prior to the inception of these proceedings he ever knew that W. L. Hathaway had advanced to W. S. Leake the sum of $1,000, or any other sum or amount.

Respondent, upon and according to his information and belief, alleges that on or about the time in said fifth amended article referred to, the said W. L. Hathaway and his said wife made a loan of the said sum of $1,000 to the said W. S. Leake, taking his promissory note therefor. Respondent denies that said sum so loaned or advanced to the said W. S. Leake was part or portion of the $5,000 referred to in said fifth article, as amended, but alleges said sum was obtained by the said Hathaway and his said wife as a loan upon an insurance policy then outstanding and existing upon the life of said W. L. Hathaway.

Respondent further alleges, upon and according to his information and belief, that the payment of the sum of $5,000 by the said John Douglas Short to the said W. L. Hathaway referred to in said article 5, as amended, and no relation whatsoever to any loan to the said W. S. Leake. That such payment of said sum of $5,000 was made by the said John Douglas Short to the said W. L. Hathaway in repayment of moneys theretofore advanced by the said Hathaway to the said Short in the sum of $2,435, and the remainder of said $5,000 was to be applied as part payment of the purchase price of certain real estate theretofore conveyed by the said W. L. Hathaway to the said John Douglas Short and the wife of the latter.

Respondent denies that all or any transaction or transactions between the said W. S. Leake, W. L. Hathaway, and the said John Douglas Short, referred to in said article 5, as amended, or involved in and/or mixed up with the official status and standing or status or standing of this respondent and/or, are known to the people of the northern district of California and/or beyond such district, or elsewhere, or at all, to the disgrace and discredit or the disgrace or discredit of respondent's office and/or to the hurt of the public confidence therein and/or of the Federal judiciary.

Respondent denies that thereby, or otherwise or at all as a result of the transactions, or any of them, in said article 5 as thus amended, referred to, he has or ever did put himself under obligation to or ever was or now is dependent upon and/or ever was or now is under the influence of the said W. S. Leake in any manner and/or, to a degree utterly or at all inconsistent with that required by the public interests of a Federal judge or otherwise or at all; and

Respondent denies that thereby or otherwise or at all he ever put himself in an attitude with regard to obedience to law and/or the rights or any of them, granted to any litigant or litigants by the law and/or with regard to the standards or any standard of open, candid conduct necessary to preserve for public officials that respect and confidence required by the public interest within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution requiring of the Federal judges good behavior as a condition upon which their tenure of office depends; and

Respondent denies that he has at any time been guilty of bad behavior and/or such behavior as constitutes a forfeiture of his right to hold his said office of judge of the said northern district of California.

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted in his answer heretofore filed herein, and in this answer to said article 5, as so amended, respondent denies each and every allegation therein contained, relating or referring to the said Russell-Colvin Co. case, so called.

Answering the allegations of article 5 as amended, insofar as the same relate and refer to the Lumberman's Reciprocal Association case, so called, respondent hereby refers to and incorporates herein his answer now on file herein to article 2 of the articles of impeachment, and further says:

Respondent denies that all or any of the facts or circumstances set forth in said article 5, as so amended, became published and known or published or known in the said northern district of California.

Respondent denies by any act or acts referred to in said article 5 as so amended, he exhibited himself to the public as being willing to obstruct the officials or any official of the State of California in their efforts to conserve for any citizen or citizens of the State of California the assets of said Lumberman's Reciprocal Association either impounded or otherwise; and

Respondent denies that he ever exhibited himself to the public as being willing to assert a jurisdiction he did not possess or willing to defy a mandate of the circuit court of appeals, or of any other court; and

Respondent denies he exhibited himself to the public as being willing to attach an illegal and unconscionable or illegal or unconscionable condition to the mandate in said article 5, as amended, referred to for the purpose or reason in said article 5 as amended referred to, or for any other reason or at all.

Respondent denies that any act or step taken by him as such judge in the matter of the Lumberman's Reciprocal Association matter, so-called, was or is to the scandal and discredit or the scandal or the discredit of respondent and/or to his said court, and/or prejudical to the dignity of the judiciary.

And, except as hereinbefore admitted in his answer to article 2 of the articles of impeachment, heretofore filed herein, and in this, his answer to said article 5 as so amended, respondent denies each and every allegation contained and set forth in said article 5 as so amended, relating or referring to the said Lumberman's Reciprocal Association matter, so-called.

Answering the allegations of article 5, as amended, insofar as the same relate and refer to the Fageol Motor Co. case, so-called, respondent hereby refers to and incorporates herein his answer now on file herein, to article no. 3 of the articles of impeachment, and further says:

Respondent denies that he knew or that any of the people of the community referred to in said article 5 as amended, knew, that at the time the said G. H. Gilbert was appointed receiver of the Fageol Motor Co., said G. H. Gilbert was utterly, or at all, without qualification to discharge the duties of said receivership and respondent denies that said G. H. Gilbert was incompetent or without qualifications to discharge his said duties.

Respondent denies that the appointment of the said G. H. Gilbert was made in tyrannical and/or oppressive disregard of the rights and interests, or the rights or interests, or any party in interest of the duty to conserve the assets of said company and denies that said appointment was made by respondent in disregard of his duty to the Government which had commissioned him to be one of its judges.

Respondent denies that the facts and circumstances, or any fact or circumstance, surrounding the appointment of the said Gilbert or the appointment of the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys, and/or the method of procedure therein on the part of this respondent inevitably, or at all, as a necessary or any consequence, were prejudicial to the judiciary and/or was to the scandal and disrespect or scandal or disrespect of the court presided over by respondent and/or to the administration of justice therein.

Respondent denies that the plan of assignment followed by the judges of the court of which respondent was and is a member, ever was or is determined by drawing numbers from a bag.

Respondent denies that the parties in interest in said matter, or any of them, under threat of going into bankruptcy, or under any other threat, effected an agreement with the said receiver and his said attorneys by which any representative or representatives chosen by them were to have effective or any control, other than as hereinafter specified, of the business and/or legal matters of said company, and denies that the said receiver and his said attorneys offered no objection to said representatives of any such alleged plan or agreement. In this behalf respondent alleges, upon and according to his information and belief, that the said receiver and his said attorneys at all times during the administration of said receivership offered to and did cooperate with the representatives and creditors of said Fageol Motor Co. in bringing about an efficient and businesslike administration of the affairs of said receivership.

Respondent denies that under the circumstances set forth in said article 5 as amended said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel accepted from the assets of said company the sum of $6,000, or any other sum, and/or the said receiver received approximately the same amount, or any amount.

Respondent alleges that at no time did he allow to said Gilbert as such receiver or to the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, his attorneys, any compensation whatever for any service by either or any of them rendering in said receivership proceeding. That whatever compensation was allowed and whatever compensation was received by them was allowed, determined, and fixed in either some other department of the court not presided over by respondent or by the referee in bankruptcy.

Respondent denies that any fact or any circumstance connected with said Fageol Motor Co. receivership showed to the people of said district that said receiver and said attorneys were not selected by respondent primarily because he deemed them best qualified to administer said estate or that their selection or the selection of any of them resulted in a large degree, or at all, from the desire of respondent to procure for said receiver and said attorneys, or either or any of them, pecuniary benefits from the assets of said Fageol Motor Co.

And respondent denies that all or any of the facts and circumstances referred to or set forth in said article 5, as so amended, received general or any publicity in the northern district of California or elsewhere, to the scandal and disrepute or to the scandal or disrepute of the court of said district.

Respondent denies that at any time prior to the inception of these proceedings he ever made to the public, or to anyone, any explanation for the appointment of the said Gilbert as receiver or the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys, and denies that any alleged explanation or excuse of respondent has been given wide or any publicity in the said district, and further denies that any such alleged excuse or explanation was to or did create the impression and/or public belief that respondent was attempting to hide his actuating motive or real motive for making such appointments, or any appointment, by an insincere and/or hypocritical claim of having been so actuated, to the disgust and/or humiliation of the people of the northern district of California and/or to the hurt of the public interest.

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted in his answer heretofore filed herein, and in this answer to said article 5, as so amended, respondent denies each and every allegation contained and set forth in said article 5, as so amended, relating or referring to the said Fageol Motor Co. case, so called.

Answering the allegations of article 5, as amended, insofar as the same relate and refer to the Prudential Holding Co. case, so called, respondent hereby refers to and incorporates herein his answer, now on file herein, to article 4 of the Articles of Impeachment, and further says:

Respondent denies that G. H. Gilbert was appointed receiver in said matter without any hearing being had upon said petition and denies that the first information said Prudential Holding Co. had of the apointment of said receiver was when said receiver and his counsel appeared in its office to take charge of its affairs. In this behalf, respondent alleges when the petition in said matter was presented to respondent with a request for the appointment of a receiver, there appeared at said time with the attorneys for the petitioner, one J. H. Stephens, a director and vice president of said Prudential Holding Co., who then and there consented to and joined in the request for the appointment of a receiver of the affairs of said Prudential Holding Co.

Respondent admits that said petition was verified by one of the attorneys for said petitioner and alleges that said verification recited that such attorney had been authorized by the plaintiff to verify and file the same.

Respondent denies that the said petition was filed without truth or justification and with reference to the remaining allegations of said article 5, as so amended, relating to said Prudential Holding Co., respondent respectfully refers to the matters and things contained in his answer on file herein to article 4 of the articles of impeachment.

Respondent further denies that the proceedings or any proceeding, fact, transaction, or statement made in or about or relating to the said Prudential Holding Co., became a matter of general knowledge within and/or beyond the northern district of California, or elsewhere, with its, or any reasonable, and/or probable and/or inevitable consequence to arouse, or that there was aroused dread and apprehension or dread or apprehension of said court, and/or the judicial power possessed by respondent, on the part of the people generally, and/or particularly of those whose property might be seized upon through the instrumentality of said court so presided over by respondent, and/or generally to make said court disrespected and/or hateful.

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted in his answer heretofore filed herein, and in this answer to said article 5, as so amended, respondent denies each and every allegation contained and set forth in said article 5, as so amended, relating or referring to the said Prudential Holding Co. case, so called.

Respondent admits that on or about the 19th day of September 1929, upon petition in due form, he appointed G. H. Gilbert receiver of the property of the Sonora Phonograph Co. That the order so appointing the said Gilbert also appointed as coreceiver the Irving Trust Co. of New York. Said receivership was an ancillary one, the main receivership being in the State of New York, and at which place the said Irving Trust Co. was the domiciliary receiver.

Respondent denies that at the time he so appointed the said G. H. Gilbert receiver he then was or ever since has been or is now either a personal or political friend of respondent. And in this behalf alleges the said Gilbert was and still is an acquaintance for whom respondent has at all times entertained a friendly feeling and one in whom respondent has placed confidence and trust.

Respondent admits that he knew the said G. H. Gilbert was a friend of said W. S. Leake, but respondent never knew the extent of the friendship existing between them. Respondent never knew until after the inception of these proceedings that the said G. H. Gilbert, or his wife, were patients of the said W. S. Leake or had contributed any sum or amount to him as compensation or otherwise for the services rendered by the said Leake to the said Gilbert and his said wife and respondent denies, upon and according to his information and belief, that the said G. H. Gilbert ever made any contribution to the said W. S. Leake except as and in payment for the said services so rendered by the said Leake to the said Gilbert and his said wife.

Respondent alleges that his appointment of said G. H. Gilbert as such receiver was not caused or brought about in any manner or form, directly or indirectly, by the said W. S. Leake and his appointment was not, to any extent whatever, influenced by the fact that said Gilbert was an acquaintance or friend of the said W. S. Leake.

Respondent denies that the said G. H. Gilbert was without qualification to discharge the duties of such receivership, and respondent further denies that the whole training and experience of said G. H. Gilbert had been as operator and employee of a telegraph company.

Respondent denies that said G. H. Gilbert was appointed such receiver without regard to the interest of the estate in receivership and/or in disregard thereof, and/or of the interest of the creditors or creditor or any party in interest and/or in violation of the official duty of respondent.

Respondent admits that for his services as such receiver the said G. H. Gilbert received in round numbers the sum of $6,800, and in this behalf respondent alleges that the amount of his compensation as such was fixed and determined by the provisions of section 48, subdivisions D and E, of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended, and not otherwise.

Respondent denies that all or any of the facts relating to said Sonora Phonograph Co., referred to in said article 5, as amended, became the subject of newspaper comment and/or matter of common knowledge throughout and beyond or throughout or beyond the northern judicial district of California, to the hurt of public confidence in respondent as judge of said court and/or to the hurt and/or standing of the Federal judiciary.

Respondent denies that it also became a matter of newspaper comment that about 1925 or 1926, when respondent was one of the judges of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the city of San Francisco, that the said G. H. Gilbert had been appointed an appraiser of certain real estate, respondent well knowing at the time of such appointment that the said G. H. Gilbert was without qualification to act as such.

Respondent denies that if he ever appointed said G. H. Gilbert as such appraiser he knew at said time that said G. H. Gilbert did not possess the requisite qualifications to appraise the value of such real estate, the respondent denies that he ever knew that said Gilbert never saw the real estate he was appointed to appraise, or that he did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate but only signed the report which was presented to him. Respondent denies that he ever presented any such report to the said G. H. Gilbert for signature, and for the reasons hereinafter stated respondent is unable to either affirm or deny that for such alleged services the said Gilbert received the sum of $500.

Respondent alleges that he cannot ascertain from said article 5, as so amended, and it does not appear therefrom, in what matter or proceeding it is claimed about 1925 or 1926 respondent appointed said Gilbert such appraiser. Respondent alleges he has no recollection whatsoever of the matters and things in said article 5, as amended, there referred to, and without such additional information respondent is unable to further or in more detail answer the allegations thereof relating to said matter.

Respondent denies that the fees allowed to Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, the attorneys for said receiver in said matter, were excessive or that said fees, except as hereinafter explained, were allowed over the protest of any party in interest on the ground that the same were excessive. In this behalf respondent alleges, upon and according to his information and belief, the moneys collected or coming into the hands of the said receiver, within the State of California, amounted to the sum of $350,000, or thereabouts, and that upon application made by the said receiver and his said attorneys for compensation for said attorneys, respondent was informed that the Irving Trust Co. of New York and the committee of creditors at said place had consented to an allowance in full of the services of said attorneys of the sum of $15,000. Respondent upon the submission of said matter made an order allowing as compensation for said attorneys the said sum of $15,000, and thereafter upon subsequent application being made for an additional allowance in the sum of $7,500, which application came on to be heard in open court and which said application was opposed by said parties so theretofore stipulating to the allowance of said sum of $15,000, respondent as such judge, after a full hearing on such application, made an order allowing an additional sum of $5,000, from which no appeal was ever taken.

Respondent denies there ever was any loss of public confidence by the bar and/or by the people of the northern district of California, or particularly of the city of San Francisco, caused by or due to any act of respondent as such judge, with relation to any matter or thing arising from or growing out of, or connected with, the receivership of the said Sonora Phonograph Co.

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted, respondent denies each and every, all and singular, the allegations contained in said article 5 as so amended, relating or referring to the said Sonora Phonograph Co. case, so called.

Respondent admits that said G. H. Gilbert was appointed receiver in the Stempl-Cooley case, so called, referred to in said article 5, as amended.

Respondent alleges that the property involved in said receivership consisted of 5 apartment houses in the city of San Francisco and 1 building in the course of erection. Respondent alleges that the records of the court in which said action was pending show that Keyes & Erskine were the attorneys appointed for said receiver. Respondent further admits that the said receiver was allowed for his services in said matter the sum of $500 and alleges that said sum was and is a fair and reasonable sum for the services so rendered by the receiver in said matter and that no appeal was taken from the allowance of said sum.

Respondent admits that on the 5th day of September 1930, he appointed one George N. Edwards as receiver in the Golden State Asparagus Co. case, so called, in said fifth article, as amended, referred to.

Respondent further admits that the said George N. Edwards was named and appointed said receiver at the request of and with the consent of all attorneys interested in said case.

Respondent further admits that he suggested to the said George N. Edwards the appointment of said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys in said receivership matter, which suggestion was acceptable to and accepted by the said George N. Edwards, respondent at said time, stating to the said receiver if such attorneys were not satisfactory to him he would suggest others.

Respondent admits that he allowed to said attorneys Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel the sum of $14,000 on account of services rendered by them as attorneys for said receiver, and in this behalf respondent alleges that such sum was a reasonable and proper amount to be allowed at said time, on account of services theretofore rendered by them.

Respondent denies that any act or acts of his referred to in said article 5, as amended, relating to or growing out of said Golden State Asparagus case, so called, were well known to the public in and/or beyond said northern district of California and/or cumulatively added to the disrespect, apprehension, and/or public contempt.

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted herein, respondent denies each and every allegation contained in said article 5, as so amended, relating or referring to the said Golden State Asparagus Co. case, so called.

Wherefore respondent having fully answered said article 5, as amended, declares that he is not guilty of any of the charges therein contained and denies that he has been or that he is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, or has been guilty of any high crime or any misdemeanor in office, and likewise denies that he has not conducted himself with good behavior.

SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK—UPON ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT PRESENTED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Filed April 17 (calendar day Apr. 18), 1933.

Answer of respondent, Harold Louderback, to article 5, as amended, of the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Attorneys for Respondent, San Francisco, Calif.

The motion to strike out or make more certain portions of article 5, as amended, submitted by counsel for the respondent, is as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK—MOTION TO STRIKE OUT OR MAKE MORE CERTAIN PORTIONS OF ARTICLE 5, AS AMENDED

The respondent, Harold Louderback, moves the Honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order as follows:

1. Striking from article 5, as amended, the first paragraph thereof, constituting the entire first page; and

2. Striking therefrom the following part and portion thereof contained on pages 3 and 4 and reading as follows:

"It also became a matter of newspaper comment in connection with that receivership matter and others that theretofore, about 1925 or 1926, the said Gilbert had been appointed by the said Harold Louderback when the said Harold Louderback was a judge of the Superior Court of California, an appraiser of certain real estate, the said Harold Louderback well knowing at the time of such appoints that the said Gilbert was without any qualification to appraise the value of such real estate, and in truth the said Gilbert never saw said real estate, and that the said Gilbert did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate, only signing the report which was presented to him, for which services he was allowed the sum of $500."

The first part of said motion is based upon the ground and for the reason that it is impossible for respondent to be prepared to meet the said charge therein contained or to summons witnesses in respect thereto without being advised, first, the nature of the act or acts there attempted to be complained of; second, the time or times of said act or acts were committed by respondent; third, in what action or actions, proceeding or proceedings, such alleged acts occurred; fourth, the nature of the relationship and transactions of said Leake there attempted to be referred to and, fifth, with what appointee or appointees of respondent said "relationship and transactions" with the said Leake occurred.

And the second part of said motion is based upon the grounds that the alleged offense there referred to was not committed in the office now occupied by respondent and that this honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, has not jurisdiction to inquire into the transaction attempted to be complained of in said article 5, as amended, in that the act there attempted to be complained of is not and cannot be the subject of this article of impeachment, and is not and cannot be a high crime or misdemeanor as defined by the Constitution of the United States, but if true is an act committed by respondent while an officer of a State and not a Federal court.

And, in the event of the denial of said motion, or either part thereof, then and in such event, respondent moves this honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, to require the House of Representatives of the United States within a time so to be fixed, to further amend said article 5 in the particulars and each thereof specified herein as the reason and grounds for the making of said motion to strike therefrom the portions of said article 5 as amended, above specified.

Dated: April 18, 1933.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Counsel for Said Respondent.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK—UPON ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT PRESENTED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Filed April 17, 1933 (calendar day Apr. 18), 1933.

Motion to strike out or make more certain portions of article 5, as amended.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Attorneys for Respondent, San Francisco, Calif.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to counsel being heard on the motion at this time? Have the managers on the part of the House anything to say with regard to that matter?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House have no objection to the present consideration of the motion. I believe counsel on the part of the respondent will indicate to the President and the Senate that agreement, in effect, has been reached between counsel for the respondent and the managers with reference to the matter.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, unfortunately, I did not hear a single word said by the honorable attorney for the respondent. It would be a useless proceeding if in the conduct of the case none of the Senators hear anything counsel says. Counsel and the respondent are entitled to be heard. For the third time, I beg and plead with counsel to speak so that those immediately near him may hear. Not having heard a single word that the honorable attorney said, I cannot reply.

I have no suggestion to make other than that, in the interest of time, without attempting to prejudice either side, and without intending any discourtesy to either side, may not the pleadings be filed and considered as read? Unless the honorable attorneys for the respondent demand that their pleadings be read, I think time would be saved if they might be printed, as they will be tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arizona, for his information and for the information of the Senate, that counsel for the respondent have presented an answer and a motion; they have also asked that the answer and the motion be filed and that they may be permitted to make a statement with regard to it. The managers in behalf of the House have consented to that procedure and have intimated that counsel for the respondent will make some suggestions with regard to the motion and answer. The Chair recognizes the counsel on the part of the respondent.

Mr. ASHURST. If the honorable counsel will pardon me for a moment, witnesses and counsel in the various proceedings usually stand where the honorable Sergeant at Arms now sits. May I ask, in order that we may have audition and hear what honorable counsel have to say, that the honorable counsel stand in a position facing the Senate near where the Sergeant at Arms now sits?

Mr. HANLEY. Mr. President, and Members of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, the managers on the part of the House have filed their amendment to article 5. There are recited in the first paragraph of the article as amended certain matters which we have filed a motion to strike out or make more certain. We are now informed by the managers that they will agree that the reference in paragraph 1 of the amended article 5 shall only refer to matters set out in articles 1, 2, 3, and 4 and the rest of the amended article 5, and that no testimony other than refers to those matters will be offered or attempted to be introduced.

So far as our motion to strike out and make certain in reference to that particular matter is concerned, we are content, because we now know where we stand with reference to meeting proof.

With reference to paragraph 1, on page 1852—I am referring to the RECORD, so that it may be followed—there is a statement with reference to the conduct of the respondent while he was a State judge. We hold that that is not a matter over which the Senate has jurisdiction. We say to the Senate and to the President that it is not an impeachable matter, and therefore it has no place in any article or amended article of impeachment.

It is further uncertain in that the alleged appraisement set forth refers to some case happening in a certain year, but no case is named and no time is given. Therefore we are in no position, except by guesswork, to answer that particular article.

With reference to this matter the chairman of the managers has stated to us that he wants about 10 days or a little longer to find out what the case is, and then we will reserve the right to object to it upon the ground that it is incompetent and irrelevant when we meet the proof that will go to that article; and we think we have fully answered with reference to the new specifications in article 5, as amended, which were handed to us only yesterday. We sat last night until 12 o'clock and worked out the answer, and that is why we asked for a recess until 2 o'clock, so that the case might be advanced and there might be no delay. We are anxious to go to trial at the earliest date, and the date which has been fixed is May 15.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House would like to make a very brief statement with regard to the observations just made by counsel for the respondent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will make his statement.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, the statement made by counsel for the respondent with regard to the position taken by the managers with reference to the allegation in the articles of impeachment is accepted by the managers as a correct statement within the understanding between counsel for the respondent and the managers.

I wish only to make one observation with regard to the other statement. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate except to say that the managers on the part of the House are not attempting to impeach Judge Louderback by reason of something which he did as a State judge. Without going into details, it is the belief of the managers that testimony with regard to the transaction referred to is admissible under at least two well-recognized rules governing the admissibility of testimony. I do not want to go any farther than that. I thank you, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, I wish to supplement in one particular a matter mentioned by my associate in regard to the proceedings referred to in the amended article of impeachment as having taken place in the State court. It was agreed and understood between counsel representing the respondent and the learned managers that unless by the 5th of May next we were furnished the title of the proceedings and the time at which the matter there referred to took place, that part of the amendment would be withdrawn and no proof offered in support thereof, to which we also made the promise that if we, in the meantime, ascertained what that proceeding is we ourselves will at once notify the managers. With that statement, I think we are agreed on the question of this pleading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any further matter to come before the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment at this time?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if neither the honorable managers on the part of the House nor the honorable attorneys for the respondent have any further motion or suggestion to make, I am going to move that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, take a recess until May 15.

Mr. LINFORTH. May I suggest that it might be well to have a meeting on May 1 in order that the replication may be filed?

Mr. ASHURST. Does the honorable attorney for the respondent wish the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, to convene again in order that he may file the replication?

Mr. LINFORTH. It being stated to me by the chairman of the managers on the part of the House that the replication will be in the usual and ordinary form, with that understanding I am content that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, take a recess until May 15.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, Mr. President, predicated upon the agreement or understanding as stated here, I now move that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, adjourn until Monday, May 15, this year, at the hour of 12:30 p.m., at which time the trial will begin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, adjourned until Monday, May 15, 1933, at 12:30 o'clock p.m.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate returned to legislative session and resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, is the pending question on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH. In connection with the amendment, and in support of it, I should like to read a letter from the Democratic editor of the leading Democratic paper of New England. It is dated April 12, and reads:

> MY DEAR SENATOR: As you know, the farm-relief food taxes will cost the wage earners millions of dollars at a time when wages have been severely reduced. But the Bankhead amendment, which taxes all food stocks on the floors of retail and wholesale grocers, will add to the plight of consumers. It means that those who buy for cash and cannot afford to stock up will be badly punished. Those who have money and credit can purchase their supplies before the bill goes into operation. I think you will agree that this is rough business.
> I can think of no other case where such taxes were imposed on goods actually in the hands of retailers. Therefore I am sure there is wide-spread protest against this unfairness.
> The farm-relief bill is bad enough without imposing the drastically unfair additional tax.
> Can you not do something for the great mass of consumers by eliminating this amendment?

Mr. President, that letter very directly and very concisely states the case in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. It is unnecessary to engage in any extended argument. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be adopted, and that this provision of the bill, which is a punishment upon the poor consumer, namely, those consumers who are not able in advance to stock up with sufficient food supplies to escape this tax, will be eliminated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. OVERTON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LONG] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I desire to register my protest against the pending bill. It is the most extraordinary and revolutionary measure ever presented to an American Congress. With its declaration of policy I am in agreement. It is a laudable purpose to attempt to establish and maintain a balance between production and consumption of agricultural commodities such as will bring about fair prices paid to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a comparable purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy. I am sure that every Senator is interested in improving agricultural conditions. I would support any measure within the limits of the Constitution which I believed would improve the agricultural industry, and not work an injustice on the great mass of our people. This bill taken as a whole would do the country more harm than good and visit upon the mass of consumers additional hardships and burdens. With the exception of that part relating to agricultural credits, I am opposed to the provisions of this bill.

The bill is reported to the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry without any recommendation. It is stated in the report of the committee that considerable hearings were had by the Senate Committee, but on account of the desire of the administration that no change be made in the bill as it came from the House, the bill is presented to the Senate in practically an unchanged form, except there are added part 3 relating to the cost of production and title 2 relating to agricultural credits. Clearly that part of the measure relating to the allotment plan is not the product of the best thought and judgment of the committee. It is presented not as a measure that appeals to the reason of the majority of the committee but upon the ground that the administration demands it. No one in either the House or the Senate has been able to state with any degree of accuracy the effect of this legislation. No one sponsoring the bill has attempted to approximate the cost of administration, nor estimate the extent of the financial burden that would be placed upon the back of the consumer. It is presented solely as an experiment. The President in his recent message to Congress on this subject stated: "I tell you frankly that it is a new and untrod path."

Mr. President, according to press reports the chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives refused to introduce the administration's measure in the House, and the chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate, the able Senator from South Carolina, who has devoted a lifetime to the study of agricultural problems, has not yet subscribed to its provisions.

The allotment plan, if put into operation by the Secretary of Agriculture, would create a gigantic sales tax on the necessities of life which it is estimated by people in the trades would cost the consumer in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 based on present consumption. This increase in food costs would necessarily bring about a decrease in consumption in the industrial centers, thereby intensifying rather than ameliorating the present conditions. While it is urged by the proponents of the bill that a large part, if not all, of the increased cost of foodstuffs would be absorbed by the manufacturer, the fact remains that increased costs of the necessities of life are invariably passed on to the ultimate consumer. The increase in the cost of food and clothing at a time when need is so great and means of obtaining them so difficult violates every rule of sound economics and social policy. The growing demand for direct subsidies just now represents one of our gravest dangers.

Mr. President, this plan develops no new markets, creates no new national wealth, and would not increase the general purchasing power of the country. It simply takes from one class to give to another. I do not believe that our real dirt farmers as a whole want this bill passed in its present form. Representing as I do one of the great agricultural as well as industrial States, I have received a large number of communications from farmers in regard to the various proposed measures for farm relief. The overwhelming majority of those who have written state that the only relief they believe can be had in a legislative way is a lowering of their tax burdens—which, of course, as a general proposition addresses itself to the State government and the local subdivisions thereof—and easier credit facilities which would permit long-time mortgages at a lower rate of interest. To a proper proposal providing such credit facilities I would lend my support, provided it is not attached to other legislation of an experimental nature which might wreck and ruin the agricultural industry. The real dirt farmers of this country recognize the fact that economic problems of production and income cannot be solved by legislative action but depend upon the operation of natural economic laws.

There is no city in the entire country more interested in the welfare and the prosperity of those engaged in agriculture than Kansas City, Mo. Situated as it is, in the center of a great agricultural section, its welfare depends largely upon the prosperity of those who till the soil. Recently the agricultural committee of the chamber of commerce, in order to ascertain what the farmers themselves really desired in the form of relief, sent out a questionnaire addressed to farmers in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, and Colorado. This gave them an opportunity to speak directly for themselves, instead of through spokesmen, upon the question of whether they desired the allotment plan. Every possible effort was made to obtain a fair expression, free from any organized or unorganized influence. Letters were mailed to editors of rural newspapers, bankers in agricultural communities, and county assessors, asking them to furnish a list of 25 names of farmers to whom the questions might be submitted. In all, the letters went to 484 counties in the 6 States. It was suggested that the names furnished be of those actually engaged in farming, either as renters or owner-operators, without consideration of political faith, financial standing, or former expressions on these subjects. The idea was to procure a list of representative men to whom their neighbors would go for consultation or advice on farm problems. That the list is truly representative is indicated by the receipt of more than 600 letters supplementing the ballots, in which reasons for their attitude on the questions were given. The letters came from farmers who think clearly. The dominating note was one of discouragement with present conditions but not one of despair. A surprisingly large percentage expressed the opinion that they would be able to work out of their present difficulties without governmental assistance, except in refinancing farm mortgages. There is almost universal demand for lower taxes, lower salaries of public employees, and lower cost of things which farmers must buy. The poll is not yet fully completed. A sufficient number of ballots have been received, however, to indicate definitely the train of actual farm thought. Approximately 6,000 replies have already been received, and the decision was about 2 to 1 against the domestic-allotment plan.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the memorandum prepared on this subject by the agricultural committee of the Kansas City Chamber of Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARRAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

For several years those who designate themselves as spokesmen for farmers or for farm organizations have been very active in efforts to obtain farm legislation. The agricultural committee of the Kansas City Chamber of Commerce recently decided to permit the farmers in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, and Colorado to speak directly for themselves instead of through spokesmen on these four questions:

Do you believe the Agricultural Marketing Act and the activities of the Federal Farm Board should be continued?

Do you favor a domestic-allotment plan?

Do you favor the Federal Government attempting to control prices or production through stabilization, allotments, or other schemes to direct price movement against natural influences?

Do you favor the Federal Government coming to the aid of farmers in refinancing mortgages and other indebtedness at lower interest rates with extended maturities?

Every possible effort was made to obtain a fair expression, free from any organized or unorganized influence. Letters were mailed to editors of rural newspapers, bankers in agricultural communities, and county assessors asking them to furnish a list of 25 names of farmers to whom the questions might be submitted. In all, letters went to 484 counties in the 6 states. It was suggested that the names furnished be of those actually engaged in farming either as renters or owner-operators without consideration of their political faith, financial standing, or former expression on these subjects. The idea was to procure a list of representative men to whom their neighbors would go for consultation or advice on farm problems. That the list is truly representative is indicated by the receipt of more than 600 letters supplementing the ballots, in which reasons for their attitude toward the questions were given. The letters came from farmers who think clearly. The dominating note was one of discouragement with present conditions but not one of despair. A surprisingly large percentage expressed the opinion that they would be able to work out of the present difficulties without governmental assistance except in refinancing farm mortgages. There is almost universal demand for lower taxes, lower salaries of public employees, and lower costs of the things which farmers must buy.

The poll is not fully complete. A few cards are coming in on every mail. A sufficient number of ballots have been received, however, to definitely indicate the train of actual farm thought. It is thought best to give out this report at this time before any agricultural legislation is passed, so that Members of Congress, and others who have the best interest of the farmers at heart, may know how the farmers themselves feel about these questions.

On the first question the decision was practically unanimous. In each of the six States and in every county in these States the farmers are against the continuance of the Agricultural Marketing Act and the activities of the Federal Farm Board. The vote was 1,174 yes, 4,397 no.

There were several suggestions on this question indicating that the Marketing Act might be continued with modifying amendments, and that a differently constituted farm board would be acceptable.

On the second question the decision was approximately 2 to 1 against the domestic-allotment plan. This measure was favored more in Colorado and Texas, where the votes were almost equally divided. The results by States were: Missouri, 25 percent "yes", 75 percent "no"; Kansas, 37 percent "yes", 63 percent "no"; Nebraska, 23 percent "yes", 77 percent "no"; Oklahoma, 49 percent "yes", 51 percent "no"; Texas, 56 percent "yes", 44 percent "no"; Colorado, 49 percent "yes", 51 percent "no".

The 21 counties in Kansas which voted in favor of the allotment were in the Wheat Belt, yet the surprising fact is that even the majority of the wheat-producing counties were against the allotment although supposedly well-informed men frequently have stated that as high as 90 percent of the wheat farmers favored this measure.

On the third question, which really determined whether farmers were in favor of any efforts on the part of the Government to stimulate prices by stabilization, allotment, or other measures, the vote was quite similar to that on the allotment plan itself.

Every State except Texas voted "no" on this question. In Kansas there were 21 counties which favored governmental action of some sort, compared with 14 counties in Missouri, 2 counties in Nebraska, 28 counties in Texas, 28 counties in Oklahoma, and 14 counties in Colorado.

The outstanding conclusion from the answer to this question is that the large majority of farmers, 65 percent, are definitely opposed to governmental action of any sort that will interfere with the natural influences which determine values.

Many of the supplementary letters suggested that governmental activities which sustain prices in other industries, public-service corporations, and transportation should be discontinued to permit a return corresponding to that received by farmers for their efforts. Restoration of the purchasing power of the farm dollar is demanded without qualification. On question 4, which pertains to farm mortgages, the vote was most decisive. Every State and every county gave a majority favoring a lower rate of interest and a longer period of time for the payment of farm mortgages. The vote on this question was 5,019 "yes", and 681 "no".

Many letters accompanying the ballots indicated that there was also a necessity of reducing the face value of the loans as well as the rate of interest and extension of dates of payment. A few indicated that it might be better to permit liquidation to go through, even though many individuals would suffer, so that farming in the future would not be handicapped by the necessity of earning returns on an excessive valuation.

In reviewing the letters and comments it was found that practically every measure ever proposed for the relief of agriculture was suggested. There are still some who believe in the equalization fee or the export debenture; others, in fixing prices above production costs or controlling acreage or production by governmental edict. The suggestion that each farmer be permitted to market a definite and predetermined amount of commodities without any restriction and that a heavy tax be assumed against production in excess of that amount was occasionally expressed.

There is much criticism of the Government financing inefficient producers through crop and seed loans, encouraging greater production through agricultural research and extension agencies, protecting banks, railroads, and insurance companies through loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and deflating values of agricultural products through the Federal Reserve banks. Packers, millers, grain and livestock exchanges were criticized in a few letters. In several instances farmers were outspoken in their declarations that farm leaders in Washington do not represent the sentiment of those actually engaged in farming as a means of livelihood. In no case, however, was there any semblance of a majority who hold such views.

The letters clearly indicate that those who live on and operate the land and who depend upon production of farm commodities through their own efforts are thinking clearly and weighing their decisions carefully. They are particularly anxious that measures which might give temporary relief, yet be detrimental in the end, should not be enacted.

No one could go over these ballots and the letters accompanying them without reassurance that farm problems presented to actual farmers would be decided wisely and without detriment to those engaged in other lines of industry or business.

W. A. COCHEL,
(Editor Weekly Kansas City Star),
Chairman Agricultural Committee,
Kansas City Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the proposal in this measure goes far beyond any power previously believed to be possessed by our Government. We are asked to make the Secretary of Agriculture a dictator for the agricultural interests of this country, with power not only over the American farmer but over all those who process farm products. Under the provisions of this bill the Secretary of Agriculture is given authority to issue licenses to processors of farm products. He is empowered to suspend or revoke such licenses and to exclude any processor not licensed, under a penalty of a fine of $1,000 a day. Think of it! The head of a department of the Government is given the power to prevent a citizen from engaging in a lawful enterprise, and from his decision there is no appeal. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to fix prices for farm products equivalent to prices during the pre-war period from August 1909 to July 1914. Congress attempts to delegate to him the power to levy, assess, and collect a tax to be paid by the processor, to change this tax at will, and to abate or refund taxes. The Secretary is even empowered to levy, assess, and collect tariff duties upon imports into the United States, upon commodities which within the United States are subject to the processing tax. The duties so assessed are in addition to any other duties imposed by law.

Never in the history of this country were such broad powers delegated to one individual. If this bill becomes a law, the Secretary of Agriculture will become the legislative, the executive, and the judicial officer of the Government so far as agriculture is concerned. Is any dictator in all the world clothed with greater authority than that sought to be conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture?

The farmer has always been the most independent individual in our citizenship. I do not believe that he wants a dictator in his business now, and even if he does, in this day of hysteria, I am sure that as soon as he feels the fetters of restraint he will rebel.

I am opposed to the allotment plan proposed in this bill because I believe that it is impracticable and unworkable. I believe it will do the farmer more harm than good and visit a grievous burden upon the consumer. I am opposed to it because I believe it constitutes a delegation of power on the part of Congress to the Secretary of Agriculture for which there is no warrant in the Constitution.

The real need of the farmer today is a reduction in his taxes, which largely addresses itself to State and local subdivisions, and a refinancing of his mortgage indebtedness over a long period of time at lower interest rates. I favor that part of the bill relating to agricultural credits, the purpose of which is to take care of the farmer's indebtedness, and if it were presented in separate form I would cast my vote for it. Attached to it, however, is a measure carrying so many objectionable features that I feel there is more bad than good in the bill, taken as a whole, and, therefore, I am compelled to vote against the bill in its entirety.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I desire to offer to the pending bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. Is not the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Some days ago the able Senator from New Jersey accepted an invitation to address the D.A.R. Convention today at 2 o'clock. He is now necessarily absent and will not return until about 3 o'clock. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside his amendment and take it up later on his return to the Chamber.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in the Chamber at the moment, but I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be the order.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I renew the offer of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes the following amendment:

On page 13, between lines 8 and 9, add the following new subsection:

"(e) When any processing tax, or increase or decrease therein, takes effect in respect of a commodity, the Secretary of Agriculture, in order to prevent pyramiding of the processing tax and profiteering in the sale of products derived from the commodity, shall make public such information as he deems necessary regarding (1) the relationship between the processing tax and the price paid to producers of the commodity; (2) the effect of the processing tax upon prices to consumers of products of the commodity; (3) the relationship, in previous periods, between prices paid to producers of the commodity and prices to consumers of the products thereof; and (4) the situation in foreign countries relating to prices paid to producers of the commodity and prices to consumers of the products thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is practically the same provision that was in the allotment bill that was passed by the House at the last session and that was also considered by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall give publicity to the amount of increase on the finished products that the processing tax would or might necessarily require.

A good deal of opposition has been made to this bill on the ground that the consumer would have to pay a larger amount for the finished product because of this tax. This amendment is supposed to take care of that situation, to protect the consumer.

Under the provisions of the bill, there is practically nothing to protect the consumer from paying a much larger price for the products because of the processing taxes that are provided here on the staple farm products that are included in the bill.

Very little increase in these prices to the consumer would be necessary, in my opinion. In the case of the processing tax on wheat, the representative of the Millers' Association who came before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry stated that the increase of the tax on a barrel of flour would be approximately equivalent to 1 cent for a pound loaf of bread, and in his figures he apparently went the limit. I think it would be less than that, if figured accurately, but that was his estimate—that it should not exceed 1 cent per pound loaf of bread.

In the case of cotton cloth—the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] gave figures the other day—it would make only 1 or 2 cents' difference in the price of a cotton shirt that ordinarily sells for about a dollar, and that the increase in other cotton goods would be along the same line.

There is always a danger of pyramiding, however. I remember very well that when the tariff bill was before the Senate some shoe men came to my office. One represented a comparatively low-priced shoe, and the other a high-priced shoe. One manufacturer was from the East, and the other from the Middle West. They came to my office, protesting against the proposed tax on hides. They said that an ordinary little tax of 1 or 2 cents a pound that was talked of would not be reflected to the farmer at all, but that the packers would get the benefit of it. I told those shoe men that the stockmen, the farmers who raised cattle, wanted a tax of 5 cents a pound on hides. They said that, of course, if they had a tax of 5 cents a pound on hides, it would be necessary to have a compensatory duty on leather and on shoes. I told them that would be all right; and I said to those shoe men, "How much would it increase the cost of a pair of shoes if we had a 5-cent tax on hides?" Each of them took a pencil and started to figure; and the man who represented the shoe factory in the Middle West, that sells a popular shoe at a high price, said, "It would increase the price of shoes a dollar and a half a pair to the purchaser." I laughed at him. I said, "Not more than a pound of leather goes into a pair of your shoes, and yet you say a 5-cent tax would increase the price of those shoes a dollar and a half." He said, "Yes; it would"; and he went on to explain how it would be pyramided from one to the other of the processors who handled that leather, until the manufacturer and the jobber and the retailer would all get a profit because of that 5-cent tax on the leather.

So, Mr. President, I want this amendment in this bill which will prevent the pyramiding of prices of these farm products because of the processing tax.

If the Secretary gives the information as to how much the tax would increase the price of the finished commodity to the consumer, then I do not believe there would be any danger of pyramiding, because the so-called "profiteers"—and we have them sometimes in the mercantile business and the wholesale business—would be mighty loath to increase their prices to make an excessive profit—in other words, to pyramid their profits because of the processing tax if the publicity was given.

So I believe this amendment that I have offered would be a protection to the consumers of these products under this processing tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have been out of the Chamber and am not familiar with the amendment. I should like to have an opportunity to look at it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire recognition, or does he want the amendment stated?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I desire recognition if no other Senator is ready to speak on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. SMITH. As I understand this amendment, it is simply to keep those paying the processing tax from pyramiding the price to the consumer by adding a percent of return on the tax as well as on the goods themselves, and to publish that information; to ascertain the comparative prices that the goods sold for before the tax went on and what they sold for after the tax went on; and then, after the tax goes on, also to ascertain what is the comparative cost to the consumer here as compared to the cost of like articles imported. I think that is about what the proponent of the measure intends to accomplish. Am I right?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, that is exactly my intention. For instance, in the case of bread, if the tax on the processing of wheat into flour would amount to 1 cent per pound loaf, and the retailer of bread puts the price up 2 cents or 3 cents a loaf, the publicity given will let the consumer know what the price should be, and he is going to be able to protest immediately if he is charged 2 or 3 cents more for a pound loaf of bread than he should be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment of which I gave notice some days ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Virginia proposes the following amendment:

On page 13, after paragraph (4), insert a new paragraph, no. 4½, as follows:

"(4½) In case of peanuts the term "processing" shall mean the cleaning thereof, the preparation of the same for sale in the ordinary course of trade for consumption, the shelling and salting thereof, and other like methods of preparing the same for sale, including the making of peanut butter."

On page 16, line 9, after the word "tobacco", insert the word "peanuts,".

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I imagine that I was picked on to offer this amendment as being the chief exponent of peanut politics in the Senate. [Laughter.] Nevertheless, I have offered it in response to the request of the representatives of 300,000 farmers who are engaged in the production of peanuts, with dependents computed to be numerically a million and a half of persons.

I find upon investigation that the peanut crop of the country has repeatedly exceeded in monetary value the rice crop, which is included in this bill, approaching one year not long ago nearly $100,000,000. The industry is in a frightfully distressed, if not destitute, state. Peanuts have gone down from 8 cents a pound to three fourths of 1 cent a pound. Aside from the 300,000 farmers, with their dependents, who produce peanuts, the various methods of processing peanuts in the production of peanut brittle, peanut butter, peanut oils, and other products of peanuts, employ some thousands of persons; and therefore I think they ought to be included in this bill.

I do not want anything I may say to be taken, in fact or by implication, as an approval of this bill. I want that distinctly understood; but if we are to pass the bill, I want peanuts included in it. I am sorry to see that so many of the Senators who have flocked to me and told me in person that they are in favor of peanuts are now absent; but I think there are enough here to include the amendment in the bill, and I hope we shall have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will state the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This amendment involves an amendment of the section which provides what commodities shall be included in the bill. That section has once heretofore been reconsidered and acted upon. I make the point of order that it is not now open for amendment or reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to hear from the Senator from Virginia on the point of order.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Virginia knows very little about points of order and parliamentary procedure. I know that I offered this amendment about 6 days ago, and have been waiting around here every day in order to have action on it; but so many Senators have talked about irrelevant subjects that I have not been able to have it acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result can be attained by unanimous consent to reconsider the committee amendment.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby the committee amendment was adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Alabama objects?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that he may offer this amendment to some other section of the bill, because I know the zeal with which he desires to have the industry of his State come under the terms of this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Not simply of my State but of 17 other States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to be granted the privilege of putting his amendment in the bill at such a place that a point of order would not lie against it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his point of order.

Mr. GLASS. I was just about to say that I have had suggested to me by an experienced parliamentarian that I might pursue the course suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, but that is not necessary, since the Senator from Alabama was kind enough to withdraw his point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I cannot understand why Senators who oppose the bill insist on having its benefits applied to products of their own State. It does seem to me that there is a measure of inconsistency in that course. If, as some Senators have said here today, the bill is fundamentally wrong, I cannot comprehend the basis upon which an argument may be rested to include other commodities than those designated as basic commodities in the bill as it has been presented.

Of course, the bill can be modified by adding any number of additional or new commodities, but I suggest to those who are in favor of this legislation, who wish to see it tried out, who recognize it as an experiment, but as a possibly practical one, that they do not include additional commodities to the commodities already mentioned in the bill at the instance of Senators who are opposed to the measure.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas ought to acquit me of any selfish motive in the matter. As a matter of fact, the largest staple crop of my State is already included in the bill, the crop of tobacco, and I have not spoken for or against the bill. I have not presented any fundamental objections to it. But the very fact that I have been picked on to offer this particular amendment to the bill suggested to me that I did not want it to be understood that that commits me to the bill. As a matter of fact, the crop of tobacco is the largest staple crop in my State and it is included in the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have really no objection to including peanuts in the bill, but I want to serve notice that if a change of that kind is made and peanuts are included in the bill, I will propose to include flax and also oats. In my opinion there is vastly more reason why those two products should be included in the bill than that peanuts should be. I am not going to make any argument on the matter at this time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask those who understand the philosophy of the bill better than I why these commodities should not be included? If the bill is to aid in raising the prices of the commodities, why should it be limited to a very restricted number of commodities? If it is to prove beneficial, why not include peanuts and the other articles of which the Senator speaks? The Senator is for the bill?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes, Mr. President. I have no objection to including these other articles. I thought they should be included, but it seemed to be the opinion of a majority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that they should not be included.

Mr. BORAH. What I wanted to ascertain was why they should not be included. There may be a good reason for it. Why should they not be included?

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator will have to get that information from someone else. I cannot answer the question.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NYE. As I understand it, when the bill was pending before the committee, peanuts and flax were at one time accepted by the committee and made a part of the bill. I should like to know what occurred that caused those two items to be stricken from the bill as it finally was reported.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the only reason why the item of peanuts was stricken out was because they were peanuts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is not that a pretty good reason?

Mr. GLASS. I do not think so. It is not any reason at all for a crop which approximates $100,000,000 a year in monetary value.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield for an inquiry?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia what is the amount of the exports of peanuts?

Mr. GLASS. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I can answer the question, if the Senator from Idaho will yield.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The exports amount to one half of 1 percent of the production, according to the statement of the Department of Agriculture. The amount of production is 1,400,000,000 pounds. The number of acres under cultivation is something below 2,000,000. North Carolina produces 387,000,000 pounds a year, Virginia about 325,000,000, and Georgia about 425,000,000.

While I am on my feet, I should like to say that there are 13 of the Southern States which produce peanuts; and, while peanuts are referred to facetiously, they are an extremely important crop in 30 counties in North Carolina. I just give that information for the benefit of Senators.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Did I understand the Senator correctly when I thought I heard him say that the proportion of exports to production was one half of 1 percent?

Mr. BAILEY. That is the figure I gave the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the Senator from North Carolina in favor of including peanuts in the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have been very frank to express my opinion of this whole bill. My judgment is thoroughly against it; but I am going to say this: That if the bill would work a benefit for any particular product it would work better on peanuts than on anything else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My object in asking the Senator from North Carolina that question was to show that while he is against the bill as a whole he has still enough confidence in it, enough faith in its provisions, to ask that a commodity which is not included at present as one of the basic commodities be embraced within the terms of the bill. In other words, I think that fact is a partial answer at least to the very able argument which the Senator has made against the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the statement of the Senator may be justified in some respects; but I think that since this whole thing is an experiment very probably it would be wiser to confine the experiment to peanuts alone. That is the only justification on which I would be willing to put peanuts in.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement which the Senator from North Carolina has just made, that he thinks the terms of the bill ought to be applied to peanuts alone, is my justification for voting against the amendment of my friend the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am holding the floor for the purpose of finding out, if I can, why the commodities sought to be included were cut out of the bill. Was it thought that the bill would not operate successfully on these commodities, whereas it would operate successfully on these other commodities? Why were they eliminated?

Mr. SMITH. I think they were eliminated through request.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator from Arkansas addressed me first.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I defer to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I think very likely peanuts were eliminated because certain persons thought that no Senator could be found who would be willing to propose peanuts. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think it is regrettable that a jest should be made of this matter, and if I have contributed to that, I wish to make a serious statement, and then thank the Senator from Idaho, who has been kind enough to yield to me repeatedly.

Manifestly, every commodity could not be designated as a basic commodity. The bill is intended to apply to basic agricultural commodities, on the theory that if we uplift the prices of them, fair increases in the prices of other commodities will result. For that reason the very able Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] sought at one time during the progress of this measure to limit consideration and the application of the terms of the bill to wheat and cotton. He sought and others sought to make it apply to those only as basic commodities.

In all fairness, without depreciating in any sense the importance of peanuts, I think it is not true that peanuts are a basic commodity, in the sense that the term is ordinarily applied, and while I can readily understand the intensity of the fervor of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in presenting this amendment and in advocating it, we ought not to include in this bill a commodity related with respect to exports as it appears from the hearings and from the statements made here peanuts are related.

I think we ought to treat the subject seriously, and if Senators who are against the bill insist on writing into the list of basic commodities such products as peanuts, they will accomplish their purpose and make the bill ridiculous.

I know there are some Senators who are for the bill who would like to see peanuts embraced as a basic commodity, but I believe that if we include peanuts, we will be justified in extending the list to such a number of commodities that there will be no limit, and the administration of the bill may be made a practical impossibility. The list as included in the bill is already quite large. The definition of basic commodities as embraced in the bill appears to me quite as elaborate as it should be.

It is quite disagreeable to me to oppose any amendment which the able Senator from Virginia offers, or which other Senators interested in the proposition favor including, but I think it is well for the friends of this legislation to remember that it is proposed by those who avow themselves in advance as against the bill and supported by some who apparently wish to make it ridiculous.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will yield, I want to say just one concluding word.

I would not have the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator think that I am treating this matter lightly or have any desire in the world to make the bill ridiculous. On the contrary, it is not a ridiculous proposition to 300,000 farmers, with a million and a half persons dependent upon them, whom they have got to feed, whose product has fallen in the course of this depression from 8 cents a pound to three fourths of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. Those 300,000 farmers are now in a state of destitution; and if this bill is going to accomplish anything for the relief of farm products of some degree of importance I think peanuts might be included. I have already pointed out that in monetary value the crop exceeds some of the commodities already included in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I want to ask the Senator from Virginia the simple question, if he does not believe in the bill, if he does not believe that it will work and result in an increase in the prices of the basic commodities named in the bill, why does he insist on including peanuts?

Mr. GLASS. I will be frank with the Senator, and will say, with the permission of the Senator from Idaho and the Chair, that I do not know why the producers of peanuts want to have their commodity included in the bill. Perhaps it is because they believe that it may increase the price of peanuts. I do not believe it will increase the price of anything; and I may say that there is no human being who has ever been created by God upon whom I would confer the authority and the power that this bill undertakes to confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know why our risibilities should be so excited over the question of peanuts. The peanut is not the only product which is waiting here for an opportunity to get into the bill. What I want to know is why these commodities were left out? The Senator from South Carolina says they were left out by request. By request of those who produce the products? I do not so understand.

Mr. SMITH. No; they were left out by those who first drafted the proposed legislation.

Mr. GLASS. And they talk about the interests of 300,000 farmers and a million of people dependent upon them as being ridiculous!

Mr. BORAH. Those who raise peanuts in this country are entitled to the same consideration as are those who raise wheat. If the bill will work with reference to wheat, I ask the Senator from South Carolina why it will not work with reference to those who produce peanuts, or oats, or any important commodity?

Mr. SMITH. I see no reason in the world why it should not. Right here, however, let me call attention to the fact that the Senator from North Carolina has stated that less than one half of 1 percent of the domestic production of peanuts is exported. This bill undertakes to benefit only the portion of crops domestically consumed. Therefore the less exports there are of any commodity the greater the benefit to it will be. If there are no exports at all, then the entire crop is benefited by the operations of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Which constitutes a very strong argument in favor of incorporating peanuts in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. As a matter of course, the point that I am making is that no peanuts are exported.

The Senator from Virginia calls attention to the vast number who are dependent upon the growers of peanuts for a living. The peanut is a purely domestically consumed product; therefore, taking the price for the base period, if that will make it profitable for peanut growers to raise that product, they will get the full benefit of whatever the domestic price may be.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that there are other amendments to be offered to the bill; for instance, one covering sugar beets. What I want to know is whether I should vote to open the gates, if such a procedure is going to destroy this bill. I am seeking information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I, of course, know that the distinguished Senator from Idaho is making these inquiries for the purpose of determining his vote on this particular question. He has asked certain questions, and, as a member of the committee, I should like to undertake to some extent to show why peanuts were eliminated from the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I yield the floor until the Senator from Alabama shall have made his statement? Then I may undertake to get it again.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in the beginning I desire to say that I am friendly to peanut producers. There is a very large peanut industry in my own State. So I speak as one who really has a large constituency interested as producers of peanuts. I mention that merely to indicate that I am not taking an offhand view of this problem.

I say further that my first impulse was to include peanuts in this bill, but on further consideration of the subject I changed my mind about it, for this reason: In the first place, this bill, as we all know, is one which peculiarly depends upon the character of its administration. We are proposing here to give exceedingly broad and general powers to the Secretary of Agriculture for the administration of the measure. The administration seeks that authority and that responsibility. In the preparation of the bill, in the first instance, the selection of what are known as basic commodities was given, as I understand, very careful consideration. The bill went to the House in its present form, so far as that particular subject is concerned, and as it passed the House it included only the basic commodities now covered by the bill. In its consideration by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate an effort was made to reopen that subject; that effort at one time succeeded, and peanuts and flax were included. It then appeared that there would be numerous other commodities offered to be included in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the reason why these commodities were taken out was the fear that there would be a breakdown in the administration of the measure and that it would impose upon those administering it such a vast burden of activity that it would be impossible to execute or operate the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may say to the Senator, with perfect frankness, that that was the controlling consideration.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator if it is not optional with the Secretary of Agriculture whether he shall apply the processing tax or other benefits of the bill to any commodity covered by it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is, of course, optional, as the Senator from Georgia knows, as to what particular feature of the bill shall be applied.

Mr. GEORGE. I take it that he would not undertake to apply it to more commodities than he could possibly regulate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator understands the moral effect as well as the resulting pressure that will come from the representatives of any commodity included in this bill to have that particular commodity also considered in the administration of the measure.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly; I am always glad to yield to my distinguished friend from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. How many acres in Alabama are devoted to the raising of the rice crop?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator really want that information?

Mr. GLASS. That is what I asked for.

Mr. BANKHEAD. None that I know of.

Mr. GLASS. Very well. There are 329,000 acres in Alabama devoted to the raising of peanuts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I said, and I presume the Senator heard me say, that the growing of peanuts was a large industry in my State.

Mr. GLASS. But I am curious to know why the Senator is willing to bring rice within the "charmed circle" and exclude peanuts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not bring rice in; I had nothing to do with bringing rice into the "charmed circle" or any other circle. I left rice where I found it, as I left the other commodities included in the bill where I found them. It is purely a question, as I submit to the Senate, whether the friends of this bill who want to see it successfully administered are willing, because of local interests or because of their judgment that one commodity here and another commodity there should be added, that the bill should be loaded down—and we know what is going to follow as soon as the question is reopened in the least degree—to the point where at this time no adequate machinery and administrative agencies can be set up to administer an innumerable number of commodities additional to those already in the bill.

I dare say, Mr. President, that plans are in process of formation for the administration of those commodities which the administration up to this time has reason to believe are to be included in the bill; but if now the question is to be reopened and peanuts and flax and oats and barley and apples and numerous other commodities are to be included, then we can easily see the additional burden that will be placed upon the administration at this late time in the year, when the crop-planting season is rapidly expiring, although numerous speeches are still being made here on the philosophy of the bill, and we do not yet know where the end is. I submit that it would impose an undue hardship and burden upon the administration of this bill to open the question up and to enlarge its scope so as to include numerous other commodities.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It occurs to me that it will be impossible to bring back prosperity, which it is hoped this bill will bring, by limiting its operations to 2 or 3 commodities. Take flax and peanuts and sugar and that class of commodities. There is a vast amount of the wealth of the country invested in their production, and it does not seem to me quite conclusive in the way of an argument against their inclusion to say that it will increase the burden of administration. What we are seeking to do, if we can, is to try to enact a bill which will give the producers of commodities a reasonable price for them. What will Senators say to their constituents who are producing these commodities as to why they were not included in the bill? Shall we be content to say that it would impose some additional burden on its administration and expect that that will satisfy our constituents?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator let me answer the question?

Mr. BORAH. I raise that question for the reason that only this morning I had a number of telegrams insisting that a certain commodity be included in the bill. I do not know what to say to the senders of those telegrams as to why that commodity should not be excluded, except to state the fact that its inclusion will increase the burden of administration. I could say to them that I do not think the bill will accomplish anything, but they would likely reply, "We are entitled to the same chance as the producers of other commodities".

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, of course if the bill is to be reopened, and there is to be included in it every commodity which Senators think would be helped by their inclusion, there is no occasion whatever for any definition of basic agricultural commodities. It is well known that this bill is framed upon lines to try out certain heretofore untried methods of bringing to the producer an increased price for his commodity.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield in a moment. It was originally framed upon the basis of including only commodities with an exportable surplus, and it is still framed to include only those commodities, with one possible exception. But it has been frankly confessed from the beginning that experiments were being tried under the provisions of the bill, that new roads were being traveled, that the hope was entertained that by the exercise of the powers granted in the bill and without placing upon the administration of it undue and unnecessary burdens and friction, beneficial results would, in the judgment of those who are responsible for the bill, accrue not only to the producers of the basic agricultural commodities included in the bill but to the producers of all other agricultural commodities in the United States, upon the principle, well known to all students of the prices of farm commodities, that when the prices of basic agricultural commodities such as wheat and cotton rise, the prices of peanuts and oats and barley automatically and in sympathy and in competition rise with the prices of the fundamental basic agricultural commodities.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be that the increase in the price of any one basic agricultural product might be sufficient to drag all the rest of the flock along with it; but if that be true, why put in more than one? Why not let it be the bellwether for the entire fold?

I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama also, purely for information, how does the geographical territory which produces peanuts compare with the geographical territory producing rice, for instance? How does the value of the peanut crop compare with the total value of the rice crop? How does the universality of the use of peanuts compare with the use of rice? Why is rice more basic than peanuts?

Mr. GLASS. It is not in Alabama, because there are 329,000 acres in Alabama devoted to peanuts and not 1 acre devoted to rice.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not speaking of Alabama. I am speaking of the country as a whole.

Mr. GLASS. In my State of Virginia there are approximately 150,000 acres devoted to peanuts and not an acre to rice.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize there are certain geographical questions that enter into the subject, but I was not speaking particularly of Alabama and Virginia. I was speaking of the country as a whole.

Mr. GLASS. What is the basic crop in one geographical section is not the basic crop in another section.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is undoubtedly true, but if the Senator from Alabama can give me information as to a comparison between the two crops, I should like to have it. It may be that other Senators have already furnished it; but if so, I am not aware of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator from Kentucky knows in about the general way that the rest of us know that rice is not as large a crop as peanuts either in size or in financial returns. It is, however, a more nonperishable crop. It is furthermore a concentrated crop.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the nonperishability of rice due to the fact that fewer people eat it than peanuts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not care to yield for such a purpose, Mr. President. I thought my friend of Kentucky wanted some genuine information.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did want it, but I do not seem to be getting it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has not been patient enough to wait for it. I am giving it to him in broken doses. I do not care to enter into a discussion of the comparative value of basic agricultural commodities which are now included in the bill or which should be included in it at its completion. There are reasons, which I have indicated, why rice was included. I would have no objection to taking it out. But the friends of the bill might as well know that if this matter is reopened we are to be confronted with a deluge of amendments. If there were nothing but peanuts involved here as an addition to the bill, I would not even rise to object. But I saw the actual developments in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I saw that a reopening of the subject of which basic commodities were to be included in the bill was leading inevitably to a loading down of the bill, not by its friends entirely, I will say, but by many who were not interested in the passage of the bill or, at least, who expressed no real hope or expectation of a successful operation of the bill.

As I said to the friends of the bill, in taking this position I am probably making more of a sacrifice than any other Senator who votes against including peanuts in the bill. I am interested in a paramount way in a bill that will tend along general broad lines to elevate the prices of agricultural commodities throughout the United States and not merely in one local community. If those who are now urging that peanuts be included in the bill had as much enthusiasm about the successful operation of the bill as I should like to see exhibited, I would have less reason for opposing a reopening of the bill to include various other commodities.

But, Mr. President, when we load the bill down with half a dozen more commodities, we simply bring about greater difficulties in the administration, we bring about more direct collision with the body at the other end of the Capitol which has passed upon the matter. I know that some Members of this body are willing to assist delay in the final passage of the bill and the turning over to the administration of an opportunity to put it into effective operation. So I say, considering all things, we are entering upon a dangerous ground unless we want to emasculate the bill and fix it so the administration will be overloaded with items for its effective administration. There is no one here who can tell, if it be reopened upon that subject, what it may include when we get through. For that reason, Mr. President, as a member of the committee and as one who has confidence in the successful operation of the bill, I feel it my duty to oppose the inclusion of further commodities in the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I find no definition of basic commodities in the bill. I find an enumeration of basic commodities. Therefore, anything the draftsmen cared to enumerate as a basic commodity is included in the bill. As nearly as I can make it out, the only reason why peanuts or perhaps some other commodities should not be included is that those who originally drafted the bill did not regard them as basic commodities and did not see fit to include them. In that connection I want to call attention to what did occur.

Enumerated among the basic agricultural commodities originally were cattle and sheep. Both cattle and sheep were stricken out of the bill by the committee and, therefore, I think we must take it that the draftsmen of the bill were not altogether infallible in deciding what is or is not a basic commodity.

Mr. President, there is no reason why those who grow peanuts might not have whatever advantage the bill will bring to that particular commodity. For that matter, I can see no reason why any other agricultural product should not be included in the bill. What is there complicated about the administration of the bill? All we do is lease the acreage or impose the tax. The taxgatherers—that is, the Bureau of Internal Revenue—collect the tax, and then it is merely a question of passing it back, of course, to the producers of the particular commodities.

The peanut crop is grown very largely in that part of the country where cotton also is grown. We will be dealing substantially with the same farmers, with the same number of farmers, and I do not see how we will be overloading the bill in the sense that if we were now considering the Farm Marketing Act, where a board was charged with the responsibility of dealing in a particular commodity, such a statement might be literally true.

But here it is only a question of making some arrangement with the producer either to rent his acreage or to impose upon him a tax. I do not see how there is any insuperable objection to the inclusion in the bill of any particular commodity the producers of which would like to have it included in the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt the Senator with this question: There are 1,932,000 acres of land devoted to the production of peanuts. Suppose we practically destroy the peanut business, will not those acres of land be devoted to the production of cotton?

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. GLASS. They are grown in the cotton States, and there would be nearly 2,000,000 acres more of land then devoted to the production of cotton.

Mr. GEORGE. Precisely. If there is virtue in the bill, we cannot separate one crop and make application of this or any other law to it because the very fact that we have excluded it will defeat the effort to benefit it. The one substitute that we have by way of a money crop in the Southeast, the weevil having destroyed or greatly reduced cotton production, is peanuts. That is to say, peanuts constitute one of the chief crops, if not the leading crop. If we exclude peanuts from the bill, we will undoubtedly open up the same acres to cotton. If there is any profit in cotton, if there is merit in the bill, and if it is profitable to raise cotton, the moment we exclude peanuts we put that land back in cotton. We cannot work it by simply taking one particular crop and excluding all others. There is every reason why any crop that is a sizeable crop, and in any large area of the country is a basic crop, should be included in the bill. Mr. President, you might as well give us no bill for cotton, you might as well give us no bill for tobacco, if you are going to turn back on us a large acreage that is just as easily tillable in cotton or tobacco as it is in peanuts.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Idaho if he desires the floor at this time? I understood that he yielded to the Senator from Virginia with the expectation of getting the floor again.

Mr. BORAH. No; I yield for the present.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a measure which I have pending in the Senate which would obviate the necessity for some of the provisions of this bill; and that is a bill which I introduced, which I commend to the attention of Senators, bearing the number S. 1111, having to do with the reduction of the gold content of the dollar.

On yesterday, when the debate on inflation was before the Senate, I did not take part and urge the proposal which I now make, because my understanding was that the plans of the leaders did not contemplate the adoption of any amendment of that character because of the desire to hurry the consideration of this bill; but at the conclusion of my remarks I propose to ask that my amendment lie on the table, with a view of bringing it to the attention of the Senate at the conclusion of the bill.

Mr. President, it is generally conceded in this country that there will be no return of prosperity until the price level of commodities has been raised. There certainly can be no permanent recovery until property values are raised and commodity prices are raised. This bill has for one of its purposes raising the price of agricultural commodities.

Another purpose which this bill has in mind is the scaling down of farm mortgages. The process, as provided in the bill, must be voluntary. The creditor cannot be forced to reduce his mortgage or the debt which is owed to him by the debtor. It must be voluntary. We are proposing by this bill to tax the consumers of America and to bring into play the extreme powers of this Government. To do what? To make consumers pay more for the agricultural products covered by the bill.

The measure which I propose will accomplish both of those purposes. It will lift the prices of agricultural commodities and the prices of all other commodities, and thereby will make possible the reduction of mortgages upon farms, factories, and every other industrial business in the land.

Mr. President, every plan for inflation has for its purpose what? Cheapening the dollar; lifting the prices of commodities. Other plans are indirect. Other plans may work or they may not work, but I submit to the Senate that the reduction of the amount of grains of gold in the dollar is a direct inflation by increasing the volume of currency in inverse ratio to the reduction of the gold content, and the measure which I introduced some weeks ago reduces the gold content of the dollar by one third.

The direct and immediate effect of that reduction would be the lifting of the commodity price practically 50 percent. It would have the effect of scaling mortgage and other indebtedness approximately to the extent of one third.

Mr. President, how are the people of the United States ever to discharge the burden of mortgage debt, bonded debt of the States, counties, and cities, and the Nation itself, at the present price of the American gold dollar and at the present level of American commodities? It cannot be done. We face the alternatives of liquidation, bankruptcies, foreclosures, squeezing out the inflated values of other days, and getting back down on bedrock, or of increasing the money supply by reducing the value of the gold dollar.

It is said by some that Congress has no power to reduce the value of the gold dollar. I expect to address the Senate at some length on a future day upon the constitutional and legal questions involved; but at this time I shall be content with the statement that under the Constitution, which gives the Congress the power "to coin money" and "regulate the value thereof", Congress possesses now and always has possessed the power, whenever it may see fit to do so, to regulate the value of money by changing its value in relation to the value of other commodities.

The Constitution does not say "fix the value of money". It says "regulate the value" of money; and I submit that the word "regulate" means to change that relationship with regard to other commodities. What else could it mean? What did the fathers have in mind except to give the Congress the power to change the standard of money whenever it may see fit to do so?

What has the rest of the world done?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator make the contention that because of that provision in the Constitution every creditor who entered into a contract providing for the payment of money in gold took the contract with full knowledge of the fact that Congress had the right to regulate the value of money, and, therefore, it would not be in violation of the provisions of the contract, or impair the contract, if Congress should regulate the value of money?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator in reply that, as I indicated a moment ago, I do not at this time desire to consume the time of the Senate with any lengthy discussion as to the constitutional and legal features of the subject; but I might observe to the Senator that when men make contracts they make those contracts with the knowledge of constitutional provisions. They make them with the knowledge of the power of the courts and of the limitations of the courts. They make those contracts in subordination to the powers of Congress to regulate them and to control them.

I might suggest that when a debtor and a creditor make a contract with reference to money—I am not speaking now of bullion contracts; I am speaking of contracts calling for dollars—they are contracting with reference to the lawful money of the country, knowing at the time they so contract that Congress always has had the sovereign right to regulate the value of money.

A high English court only a few weeks ago decided a similar question in Great Britain. That court said in that case that a contract calling for pounds of a certain standard of weight and fineness was either a bullion contract calling for so much gold bullion or it was a contract calling for pounds. The court held that it was not a bullion contract but was a contract calling for British pounds, and that that debt could be settled in new British pounds of the depreciated value which has followed England's going off the gold standard. I hope that answers in some measure the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. President, what did England do when she went off the gold standard? England did not have to go off the gold standard. She went off the gold standard because she wanted to revalue her money. She reduced her money from $4.86 for a pound to about $3.20 for a pound. She calls it "controlled inflation." She does not redeem in gold. Her purpose was to reduce the value of the British pound; and what has followed?

Great Britain has been taking away from America trade in foreign countries because her lowered costs of production have enabled her to undersell America. Our imports are increasing. Our exports are decreasing. A similar situation is true as to every country which has depreciated its currency. The result has been that they are in position to sell more cheaply than America. The higher the dollar becomes, the greater the advantage to foreign countries.

Mr. President, now is the time of all times when the plan which I propose for the reduction of the gold content of the dollar can be accomplished.

When I spoke in this Chamber on the 24th of January, urging a reduction of the gold content of the dollar, there were Senators who held up their hands in fear that agitation of that bill would result in gold withdrawals from the Treasury and from the Federal Reserve banks. They said, "You must not urge that bill, because it will result in a run on the banks for gold, and our gold reserves will be depleted, and disaster will come to our country." I was not insensible to those appeals, and for many weeks I was not active in behalf of this measure. Finally there came the bank crisis and the passage of the emergency banking legislation. As a result of the enactment of that legislation, what occurred? An embargo on gold shipments abroad was proclaimed, and properly so. The Government issued an order suspending gold payments in America. Gold hoarders were ordered to return their gold to the Treasury or to the Federal Reserve banks. Those things have been done. Today we are actually off the gold standard, but theoretically we are still on the gold standard. However, for all practical purposes, we are on the gold standard because our money is redeemable in gold, and everybody regards it as redeemable in gold. This situation, however, is one which makes possible the enactment of a measure reducing the gold content of the dollar without permitting private profiteering. Gold hoarders cannot now profiteer at the expense of the public. The gold is in the Treasury. It is the Government's gold as a reserve. My bill provides that that gold shall be retained in the Treasury and new gold certificates issued against the gold reserves on the basis of a lower gold content.

So, of all times, now is the most propitious time within our history for the enactment of legislation lowering the value of the dollar by cutting its gold content by one third.

Mr. President, Senators who expressed grave apprehensions as to the powers of Congress to do this thing in January since that time have voted for bankruptcy laws to do what? To avoid contracts. Why do they vote to put the railroads under the bankruptcy law? They vote to allow the railroads to take advantage of the bankruptcy law for the purpose of scaling down their debts, for the purpose of affecting contracts which they have made with their creditors, for the purpose of defeating—if I may use that word—solemn contracts. In the legislation now pending we propose to use all of the persuasive powers of the Government and all of the inducements of this measure to cause mortgage holders to reduce their mortgages. Why do we do that?

We know that those mortgages can never be paid in full. We know that the mortgage holder will profit more if he gets two thirds of the amount of his bond than if he gets 100 percent in the form of a deferred debt. So how does it become immoral to cut down, under the clear authority of the Constitution, the number of grains of gold in a dollar? How is that immoral when it is perfectly moral to pass a bankruptcy law for the protection of railroads and banks? Even municipalities have been suggested. How can Senators draw a contrast between those two propositions?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I wanted to make this inquiry of the Senator from Texas. He was discussing a moment ago the fact that if his proposal had carried sometime back there might have been gold withdrawals. That could only come about if his proposal when adopted would affect the price of gold by raising it. As I understand, it would not affect the commodity value of gold. It merely would affect the acceptability of gold for payment, which is quite different from the silver proposal which came up yesterday against which the Senator voted. That would have an effect beyond the borders of this country. The Senator's proposal would be to enable $1 of today's currency to pay tomorrow $2 of indebtedness—that is, it would affect gold as the standard of measurement—not as a commodity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator is largely correct. My bill would not change the volume of gold in the world. It would not change the number of grains of gold in existence. But it would change the number of grains of gold which make a dollar, and American business, American property, American finance, and American industry are based, not upon gold as such but upon gold measured by dollars.

Let me say to the Senator that, of course, 23 grains of gold in the markets of the world would still be worth, after my bill passed, exactly the same they are worth now, with the exception that they would buy more dollars. Under my bill 23 grains of gold, instead of buying $1, would buy $1.50 in America.

Let me say to the Senator that this bill would also raise the price of silver. The bill which I propose would raise the price of silver just as it would raise the price of other commodities, because while it has no reference to silver as such, when a dollar of gold is made 16 grains instead of 23, that dollar of gold will buy less silver, and consequently silver, in terms of dollars, will be worth 50 percent more than it is worth today. Does the Senator follow me there?

Mr. ADAMS. Absolutely.

Mr. CONNALLY. So there is no quarrel between the Senator from Colorado and myself, I believe, as to the effects of this legislation.

Mr. ADAMS. My only question was whether or not we ought not to follow the broader policy, which would increase the value of silver in the Orient and in the silver-using countries and thereby increase the consuming capacity of the world, rather than merely apply it to the local debt-paying capacity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator, with reference to silver, that I never have been able to get it through my mind that we can arbitrarily fix a ratio here in the United States between gold and silver and make it effective in the rest of the world. When silver is worth 26 cents now, and we undertake by making the ratio 16 to 1 to bring that value to 129 cents, I cannot see but that all the silver in the world would be dumped upon us, and that our gold would be taken away, and that instead of having a gold standard we would have a silver standard. We would have, in effect, not a gold standard. I am not out of sympathy with the Senator, but I cannot see how we can arbitrarily fix a relationship between gold and silver, or gold and anything else. Why not coin peanuts at some ratio? We cannot do it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will just let us do it, we will make peanuts a part of the bill. Is the Senator going to propose his depreciation of the gold dollar as an amendment to my peanut amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator from Virginia that I have no disposition to delay this amendment. I took no time on the money question yesterday, and I wanted to submit some remarks today, because of the fact that it affects both this bill as it applies to agricultural commodities in general, and particularly the mortgage feature. I am sorry the Senator from Virginia is so impatient and intolerant as to the course of debate.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that I am neither impatient nor intolerant. I am simply ill, and I wanted to get a vote on my amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sorry for the Senator. If the Senator had advised me that he was ill before I took the floor, I should not have consumed any time, and I assure the Senator that I shall conclude very shortly. I merely selected peanuts as an extreme case to illustrate the impossibility of arbitrarily fixing by law a relationship between the value of any two articles and maintaining that relationship.

I may observe that gold is the only commodity on earth that I know about whose value is arbitrarily fixed by law. In the United States a dollar contains 23 grains of gold. If the gold supply should be doubled tomorrow, gold would still be worth the same, because each dollar would be composed of 23 grains of gold. If tomorrow half the gold in the world should be dropped into the Atlantic Ocean, the remaining half would still be worth 23 grains to the dollar. Why should gold, one commodity, have its value arbitrarily fixed by inflexible law, whereas the value of other commodities goes up and down with the recession of trade and of commerce and according to the law of supply and demand?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I would like to make just one observation. It seems to me there is a slight error in the Senator's contention. It does not seem to me that the value of the gold is fixed by statute. The weight of the gold dollar is fixed by statute, but the value of the gold dollar must be determined by the amount of commodities which can be received in exchange for it. Part of our complaint today is that the value of gold has gone up in terms of its exchange value in other commodities.

Mr. CONNALLY. The dollar has gone up, but the same number of grains constitute a dollar now that have constituted the dollar since 1834. The gold goes up in terms of commodities, but in terms of the dollars the value is fixed. That is the point I am trying to make. All other commodities are measured in the dollar. The dollar remains fixed in its relationship to gold. The value of gold measured in other commodities has gone skyward; but, measured in dollars, it is the same, while all other commodities are measured by the dollar, and therein lies the injustice of it.

I say to the Senator from Colorado that my bill further provides that after the gold content is once cut, thereafter all gold shall be retained in the Treasury in the form of bullion, and the number of grains which will be given in redemption for a dollar will vary from time to time according to the index price of a thousand selected basic commodities. That will obviate the objection of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, in conclusion, this measure would have the effect of scaling down the farm mortgages to which the bill refers. It would have the effect of lifting commodity prices and property values throughout the United States instantaneously upon its enactment.

It would enable America to reclaim much of her foreign trade, and to offset the depreciated currencies of foreign countries.

It would stimulate employment. When business begins to move, when debts begin to be paid, when the banks are able to collect their indebtedness on these lower standards of the dollar, we shall find a renewed activity throughout the whole business world.

Mr. President, it is said that this is a drastic step. It is drastic, but let me remind the Senate that we are living in desperate days. We are living in one of the most tragic depressions of modern times. Conditions have not materially improved. Shall we go on with deflation? Shall we continue with liquidation? Shall we squeeze out the small business man and the farmer, many corporations, many insurance companies, perhaps, which may be wrecked, or shall we now, by one drastic operation, check the forces of deflation, arrest the tide of liquidation, lift commodity prices, embark again on our successful world trade, and give America a chance to grow out of this depression, and once again enter upon rising ground?

Mr. President, this measure will eventually be adopted. I dare to venture the assertion that sooner or later, unless we are to have widespread bankruptcy, and almost complete national liquidation, some measure of this character, for the reduction of the amount of gold in a dollar, will have to be adopted by America to pull herself out of the position into which she has been maneuvered by foreign countries in the manipulation of their currencies, and of their money and their world trade.

It may require courage, but an aggressive and courageous institution of this reform to my way of thinking will do more to restore America than any half dozen measures which have been proposed.

Mr. President, I hope at some future date to address the Senate on the legal and constitutional aspects of this question, but for the present I shall be content with offering the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the Senator whether he desires to offer the amendment at this time?

Mr. BYRNES. I do.

Mr. McNARY. We were in the midst of the consideration of an amendment offered by the able Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], who was called from the Chamber, and at my request his amendment was temporarily laid aside. Will not the Senator allow us to go on with the consideration of that amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I would be content to do that, but I will have to absent myself from the Chamber a little later, and the amendment which I have sent to the desk could be disposed of in a few minutes. If it would take very much time, I would not ask for its consideration at this time. Will not the Senator from New Jersey allow me to offer the amendment at this time?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very glad to yield to the Senator to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the clerk will state.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 11, line 1, after the word "processor", the Senator from South Carolina proposes to insert the following:

Provided, That in the case of cotton the tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected at the time that the goods are invoiced for sale by the processor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. At what point in the bill does my colleague propose that amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. On line 1, page 11, after the word "processor."

Mr. President, I know very little of the processing of the other commodities referred to in this bill. In the case of cotton, however, the fact is that under the language of the bill as reported the tax would be levied, assessed, and collected at the time the raw cotton entered the manufacturer's possession. Within recent years, so far as I am aware, no cotton mill in South Carolina has been able to operate at a profit. In order to maintain their organization they often operate when they cannot manufacture at a profit and then warehouse the manufactured goods until such time as it is possible for them to sell at a profit or at least at the cost of production. In order to preserve the organization and for humanitarian reasons they continue to operate.

The effect of the bill as reported, if enacted, would be that the manufacturer must pay the tax immediately upon the raw cotton coming to the mill, and if he should be unable to sell those goods for 6 months, then he would be out of his money for that length of time. The amendment I have offered provides that the tax shall be levied and collected at the time the goods are invoiced for sale, so that when invoiced for sale the manufacturers will pay the tax and will have an opportunity to be reimbursed thereafter as soon as the goods are paid for by the purchaser. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR obtained the floor.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me for the purpose of calling for a quorum?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	King	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	La Follette	Russell
Bachman	Dickinson	Lewis	Schall
Bailey	Dieterich	Logan	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Lonergan	Shipstead
Barbour	Duffy	McAdoo	Smith
Barkley	Erickson	McCarran	Steiwer
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Stephens
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	George	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Murphy	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Byrd	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hatfield	Overton	Walcott
Carey	Hayden	Patterson	Walsh
Clark	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Johnson	Pope	White
Coolidge	Kean	Reed
Copeland	Kendrick	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will allow me, I wish to say that there has been given to me a proposed amendment to the very section to which the Senator desires to address himself. I will ask the clerk to read it, and I think it will meet the objection of the Senator.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have no objection to the suggestion made by the able Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 21, lines 20 and 21, it is proposed to strike out the words "other than a consumer or a person engaged solely in retail trade"; and on page 22, in lieu of the amendment proposed to be inserted in lines 14 to 19, inclusive, to strike out lines 9 to 13, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) The tax imposed by subsection (a) shall not apply to the retail stocks of persons engaged in the retail trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair suggest to the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from South Carolina that the question now recurs on the committee amendment, being section 9 as reconsidered and as having since then been amended. The proposed amendment by the Senator from South Carolina refers to the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, which is a different amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina what happens to lines 14 to 19, inclusive, on page 22, in view of his amendment?

Mr. SMITH. That part of the amendment has not as yet been read. The Senate has already adopted an amendment here, and in order to substitute the amendment offered by me there must be a reconsideration of the action whereby the amendment was agreed to before my amendment would be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator propose that?

Mr. SMITH. If that is the parliamentary situation, I ask that the amendment of the committee which has been adopted may be reconsidered in order that I may offer the amendment which is now proposed as a substitute for the entire section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that before that can be done the Senate must first act on section 9, page 10, the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. SMITH. Very well; let that be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. If my friend from New Jersey will permit me, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I am not clear yet as to what the Senator from South Carolina is proposing to do.

Mr. SMITH. I ask that the clerk read the amendment proposed as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield for that purpose?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do.

Mr. SMITH. It is intended as in the nature of a substitute for subsection (b), on page 22, beginning with line 9 and going down to line 19, inclusive. If the clerk will read it, the Senate may understand the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 21, lines 20 and 21, strike out the following: "other than a consumer or a person engaged solely in retail trade."

On page 22, in lieu of the amendment proposed to be inserted in lines 14 to 19, inclusive, strike out lines 9 to 13, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) The tax imposed by subsection (a) shall not apply to the retail stocks of persons engaged in retail trade, held at the date the processing tax first takes effect; but such retail stocks shall not be deemed to include stocks held in a warehouse on such date, or such portion of other stocks held on such date as are not sold or otherwise disposed of within 30 days thereafter. The tax refund or abatement provided in subsection (a) shall not apply to the retail stocks of persons engaged in the retail trade, held on the date the processing tax is wholly terminated."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COPELAND. A parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand now that the Senate consented to a reconsideration?

Mr. SMITH. No; there has been no reconsideration in this instance.

Mr. COPELAND. I am concerned about the amendment which was inserted on page 22, lines 14 to 19. As I take it, if the amendment just offered by the Senator is adopted it will wipe out the other amendment.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask for information. Is it the intention of the bill, in the form in which it was reported, to impress upon stocks in the hands of retailers or wholesalers the terms of the bill and subject them to the limitations, restrictions, pains, and penalties therein provided?

Mr. SMITH. It applies to the wholesalers, but not the retailers. The substitute offered for subsection (b) exempts retailers with a stock on hand when this tax shall go into effect, except such stocks as are held in warehouses or that are unsold and no provision made for their sale up to the time the tax goes into effect.

Mr. KING. Does it affect such a situation as this: I have in mind a large establishment in my State which purchases millions of dollars worth of commodities, including food products, and so forth, as well as merchandise. It has necessarily, because of its large activity, to have warehouses. It has these commodities in its warehouses. Sometimes they might be there for 10 days or sometimes 2 or 3 or 4 months. All of the commodities it has in the warehouses, as I understand the Senator, that it has had on hand more than 30 days, would be subject to the provisions of the act.

Mr. SMITH. If they have not been disposed of or sold within 30 days after the tax goes into effect, the stocks would be subject to the tax.

Mr. KING. Would not that tend to encourage rapid disposition of stocks even to the point of reducing the market price and deluging the markets and injuring competing firms?

Mr. SMITH. I am simply stating to the Senate the terms of the bill. Just what the effect may be I am not able to say. The terms of the bill are such that there are 30 days given under the substitute I have offered for the disposal of such stocks as are held by retailers, which stocks are not included in warehouses.

Mr. KING. It needs several prophets, outside of those in the Department of Agriculture, to properly interpret the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am very anxious to yield to the Senator from South Carolina in response to his suggestion, but I am quite sure that his proposal is not satisfactory as it reads. Wherever the term "retailer" is used in the amendment which he has submitted, there should be inserted likewise "wholesaler." We are going to have difficulty, in my opinion, in drawing the proper lines. We are going to run into the same complications I spoke about this morning unless the whole section is eliminated. However, I should be willing to compromise in order to expedite the matter if the Senator will couple the word "wholesaler" with the word "retailer" and let the clerk read it again in that form.

Mr. SMITH. If that were adopted, so far as the purposes of the section are concerned, it might defeat for a time at least the whole operation of the bill, for the reason that a provision is in the bill that the processor who has a stock on hand, has manufactured the stock, has the commodity on hand before ever the tax goes into operation, has already contracted for the consumption of all of his stock, does not pay the tax. Under the terms of the bill, when he processes whatever it is he has on hand, he does not pay the tax. He passes the tax on to the vendee. His contract has already been made with the vendee, and he is exempted from tax on all of the raw material he has up to the time the tax goes into effect. Upon all that he processes out of that product, he does not pay the tax. It is collected by the Internal Revenue Bureau from the vendee, so that the vendee, whoever he may be, the wholesaler in the first instance, has to pay the tax. The retailer is exempted. We will not get a double tax. The retailer is exempted so far as concerns the stock he has on hand or that he may receive within the 30 days.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, that is along the line of the argument advanced by the Senator from South Carolina this morning. I do not want to seem stubborn or arbitrary, because I do not mean to be either.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, under the terms of the bill, without the substitute which I have offered, the holder of the articles that would have been processed would pay the tax immediately. This is an exemption of the stock he has on hand, that he has not disposed of except such as he has in the warehouses. If he has not any stock in the warehouse but in his ordinary place of business, he must dispose of that within 30 days.

Mr. BARBOUR. I feel, particularly in the light of the explanation given by the Senator from South Carolina, that certainly the amendment suggested would be a great improvement in respect to the objections which I took the liberty of raising this morning. I should like to have a vote on my amendment to strike out the whole section. I do not care to delay the Senate, but I should be glad to have that vote taken now. If my proposal is not adopted, it clears the way for consideration of the position taken by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the section which the Senator desires to strike from the bill is in lines 14 to 19, on page 22?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is correct. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina affects subsection (b) beginning in line 9 on page 22.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from New Jersey is moving to strike out what section?

Mr. BARBOUR. The whole of section 16.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator will see at a glance that under the provisions of the section as it is proposed to amend it, some wholesalers or processors might rush into the market and purchase such a quantity of the commodities in which they are interested as to last them virtually a year and thus be exempted entirely from all tax whatever.

Mr. BARBOUR. The Senator from South Carolina, I am sure, does not mean to imply that I am trying to further any such undertaking as that?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no. The Senator is trying to protect those who already have the goods and, therefore, having bought them and arranged to dispose of them, ought not to be taxed for that in which they have already invested. I understood that thoroughly and it was discussed in the committee. It seems to me if we could ascertain at the very moment this should go into effect just the amount that is owned even by the wholesalers and retailers, that which had been processed ought to be exempt from the tax. It would be an impossibility to draw the line or ascertain the amount definitely. It is almost impossible to do otherwise than as the bill provides.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BARBOUR. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to have the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will again read the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The legislative clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BARBOUR. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee a question with regard to the first part of his proposal to amend. Is it not a fact that when we strike out the words "other than a consumer or a person engaged solely in retail trade", the effect is to leave the tax upon every other person who has an inventory containing any of these basic commodities?

Mr. SMITH. No; it will be found that the subsequent amendment which I have proposed takes care of that very matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I invite the Senator's attention to the way the language would stand after striking out as he proposes? It would then read:

SEC. 16. (a) Upon the sale or other disposition of any article processed wholly or in chief value from any commodity with respect to which a processing tax is to be levied, that on the date the tax first takes effect or wholly terminates with respect to the commodity, is held for sale or other disposition (including articles in transit) by any person, there shall be made a tax adjustment as follows:

Is it not an irresistible conclusion that any man who has an inventory of goods containing these basic commodities, whether they are in his store or in transit in a freight car or other conveyance, is bound to pay this tax? There is no exemption and no exception. By striking out the words "other than a consumer or a person engaged solely in retail trade", we put them back into the bill and make the consumer pay a tax and make the men engaged in retail trade pay the tax except insofar as we take the retail trader out by the last part of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SMITH. I am not a lawyer, but I think all were agreed that the word "person" covers all those who are in business as a merchant. The context of the bill, coming down to the proposed substitute which I have offered, would have the effect indicated, but there it takes out of the bill all but the wholesaler. There are but two persons engaged in the process of vending, the wholesaler and the retailer. Therefore, the only persons who could be affected would be the retailer, who is provided for in the section indicated, and the wholesaler, who must necessarily come under the following terms of the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am perfectly frank to admit that, like every one else, I rather think this whole section is very confusing. There is no question about that. If the Senator's explanation of his proposal is correct—and I hope he will not misconstrue the spirit in which I make that observation—I am perfectly willing to withdraw my amendment, provided his will carry.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to make this statement: I presume I will be one of the conferees. I frankly admit that the wording of this floor-stocks provision is the most confusing wording that there is in the whole bill. I know what the intent of the framers of the provision is. I heard them explain it; and if this amendment can go in, when we get into conference, without doing violence to the rules governing a conference, I shall do all in my power to simplify this language so as to protect those engaged in the business.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I share the confusion that the Senator professes to feel regarding this matter.

As I understand, the Senator from South Carolina strikes out, on page 21, lines 20 and 21, the language "other than a consumer or a person engaged solely in retail trade." That is correct, is it?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct; yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Then he likewise strikes out, on page 22, section (b) of the original bill and section (c) added by the committee. That is right?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator strikes out sections (b) and (c); and then, in place of sections (b) and (c), he inserts the language which he proposes, which has to do with the floor stocks. Then, under another section of the bill, on page 25, the distributors who have large quantities of their products in transit will have the same relief that processors have regarding loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I think I may say to the Senator from New Jersey that while it takes a lot of imagination to understand what is before us, apparently the thing which he has sought to accomplish, and which I had in my mind by proposing a reconsideration of this new section (c), I think will be accomplished; but, of course, we have to have some faith to believe that in the interpretation thereof our friends will be given protection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the two amendments offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which, without objection, will be treated as one.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New Jersey to withdraw his motion to strike out?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to strike out is withdrawn.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, as one Member of the Senate who expects to vote for the pending bill, I offer the amendment sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, line 9, after the word "tobacco", it is proposed to insert the words "sugar beets, sugar cane."

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the evident purpose of the tendered amendments is to include sugar beets and sugar cane among specified basic agricultural commodities, such as wheat, cotton, field corn, rice, tobacco, and milk and its products, included in section 11 of the bill.

Whatever else is pressed on our attention, farm and unemployment relief continue to be twin objectives of primary legislative importance. At this session of Congress we in the Senate have already dealt particularly with the one. It is well that we are about to deal, at least experimentally, with the other.

In tendering the pending amendment, I venture to recall the dominant purpose of the bill before us.

The measure is designed to alleviate farm distress, in part by market control and in part through benefit payments—which the Senator from South Carolina some days ago conceded to be essentially cash bounties procured from taxes on processors—by increasing the prices of certain agricultural commodities received by farmers to pre-war or other levels specified as "the base period" in section 2 of the measure. In the case of wheat, rice, and some other articles, the base period of average purchasing power is fixed as extending from 1909 to 1914, and, if the present bill is to become law, it is not only proper but also important and just that to the commodities thus to be dealt with sugar beets and sugar cane should be added.

The Senate does not need to be advised that farm distress is not localized in the United States. In spite of our boasted tariffs, farm bankruptcy has long existed and has continued to expand, in a fashion and to an extent difficult to describe, among the beet growers of some 17 States and the cane growers of two other States of the Union. Perhaps these States should be listed. As reported by the United States Tariff Commission in one of its summaries on tariff information in 1929, the 17 sugar-beet States are California, Colorado, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Ohio, South Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming, and Utah. The two sugar cane States, as is well known, are Louisiana and Texas.

The plight of farmers who look to sugar beets and sugar cane for all or part of their living is not less moving than that which has focused national attention on growers of wheat, corn, rice, and livestock. Many producers of livestock for reasons of their own have asked exclusion from this measure. By the same right of decision the application of a responsible group of farmers for inclusion in the bill, as an aid to individuals and communities essentially dependent on their branch of farm production and for the solution of their particular problems, would appear to be manifest.

For several years in various Western States I have been advocating a different treatment for the beet-sugar industry than one of unchanging and ever increasingly higher tariffs. In 1930 in various discussions of the tariff policies of the 12 successive years of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, I repeatedly pointed out that ever-mounting tariffs on sugar, instead of stabilizing and advantageously "protecting" sugar-beet growers, have, in my judgment, operated to their disadvantage. By extending, in the form of tariffs, large bounties through higher prices to island sugar producers under our jurisdiction—those of Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and particularly of the Philippine Islands—we have greatly expanded island sugar production. With favorable labor and other conditions, oriental in part, and liberated from the tariff impediments affecting imported Cuban sugar, duty-free island sugar, particularly of Philippine origin, has grown by leaps and bounds. With Cuban imports hampered by high tariffs, this country has been steadily stimulating effective competition and added production which tends to depress sugar prices. Philippine sugar, entering on the Pacific coast, is now trucked far inland into beet-sugar territory. It is invading the Salt Lake market. Years ago Gen. Leonard Wood declared that the Philippine Islands alone could in time produce approximately 5,000,000 tons of sugar annually—almost as much as has normally been consumed in the United States. The accuracy of that prophecy is no longer doubted.

Without any attempt to forecast our Nation's ultimate tariff policy, if this country is disposed, as in the past, to pay the price of stimulating our domestic sugar industry by tariff subsidies, a more economical and just attitude points, on the restoration of more normal conditions, to a combination of lower rather than higher tariffs for the industry and direct bounties for the benefit of sugar-beet and sugar-cane growers, instead of the continued and growing stimulation of other than continental sugar production. If we are to continue so-called "sugar protection", it is clear that in normal times farmers will be better protected and consumers can save substantially on the Nation's sugar bill by paying direct bounties saved out of the much larger indirect bounties of tariffs, when those tariffs are reasonably lowered. Fair bounties, if and when the return of normal times facilitate reduced sugar tariffs, might reasonably be made part of a modified sugar-tariff policy which would prove in the public interest, in contrast with our prior policy of ever-rising tariffs. Moreover such an experiment, with bounties limited to continental sugar, has an additional justification during that part of the period of transition to independence of the Philippine Islands in which large amounts of duty-free sugar are to be permitted to enter the United States.

There is, however, at present no little anxiety over our ruinously low sugar prices, to whatever degree affected by island sugar production and the general depression. The sensitiveness of markets at the hour even to minor disturbances leads many to believe we should halt tariff reductions until the restoration of more normal industrial conditions. With the price of Cuban 96° raw sugar c.i.f. at the port of New York recently ranging under 1 cent a pound, it is hardly necessary for the time being to inject any sugar-tariff reductions into market conditions. In fact this would rather appear to be a particularly suitable period in which to supplement bounties to beet growers by legislative provisions for a sliding-scale tariff which would increase as the price of sugar declines and decrease as the price rises. If the pending farm measure did not contemplate another method of dealing with farm products, and prices and marketing conditions, I should feel that such a proposal ought at once to be submitted to the Congress. If, however, it is possible at this hour to add sugar beet and sugar cane to the basic articles mentioned in the farm bill, that step would represent so definite an acceptance of the bounty principle applied to sugar production in the United States that it would be reasonable to ask sugar growers to accept and await the outcome of this new legislative experiment.

The Congress should bear in mind that, so long as nothing is done for the relief of our beet and cane farmers, their distress, like that of other farmers, continues and grows. It is not my purpose to elaborate on that distress beyond saying that it gravely affects the beet-producing regions in many States and farmers there who formerly were prosperous. Foreclosed farms, lost homes, closed banks, deserted fields, have set their incredible stamp, as in other parts of agricultural America, on some of our most fertile farm areas, long devoted to sugar production. For the present, therefore, and with justification, beet- and cane-sugar farmers ask to share in the present movement, aided by bounties secured from processors' taxes, to assist the revival of better farm conditions by raising present beet and cane prices to the pre-war levels.

It remains to answer the inquiry: What is involved in the amendment under the plan of the present bill?

The portion of the bill with which we are now concerned aims to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to give benefit payments to the producers of basic commodities enumerated in section 11, so as to raise the purchasing power of farmers in terms of articles that the farmers buy to the level of the purchasing power of such articles in the base period specified in section 2. Benefit or bounty payments are provided for in sections 8 (1) and 12 (a). To raise the amounts necessary to reimburse farmers' taxes on processors are to be levied. These are provided for in section 9 (b) of the bill as amended during the period of the emergency which may be declared terminated by the President under section 13. Processors are to be licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture under section 8 (3) which also provides for the adjustment of marketing conditions so as to eliminate unfair practices and charges and to restore normal economic conditions.

So much has been said to make clear the general nature of the sugar problem and the appropriateness of consideration being given to it under a bill calling for farm relief and an increase in agricultural purchasing power. It will, of course, be asked what will be the effect on the price of sugar beets and sugar cane by their inclusion by amendment in the pending farm bill? It is possible to make approximate calculations indicating a gain to sugar-beet and sugarcane farmers of something like $1 per ton if the amendment is adopted and made effective. The precise sum is one for speculation; at the moment it appears possible only to make estimates. The Congress and the public, however, will alike wish to know whether such an increase if made would be excessive. The reverse appears to be clearly established.

With respect to the probable increase in prices I have had two unofficial estimates made, one by a governmental expert in Washington, another by an economist. Asked to calculate the increased prices which may be looked for by beet growers if the bill is enacted with the amendment, the Washington expert, who is associated with the Department of Agriculture, some time ago wrote me as follows:

> Applying the principles set forth in the bill, I reach the conclusion that inclusion of sugar in the bill would involve a guaranty at this time of $5.865 per ton for sugar beets as the average "fair exchange value" for the producing areas of the country as a whole. This compares with an average price during 1932, on the basis of reports thus far submitted to the Department of Agriculture, of $5.05 per ton. With reference to sugarcane, the result I get is $4.20 per ton, as compared with an actual average price in 1932 (based on partial returns) of $3.19 per ton. This estimate for sugarcane, however, is subject to a very considerable margin of error owing to the inadequacy of the pre-war price data that were used.
> The results arrived at were secured as follows:
> First, sugar beets. On the basis of statistics given in the Department of Agriculture Yearbook for 1915, page 497, with interpolations for the missing years 1909 and 1910, the average farm price received for sugar beets in the United States for the crop years 1909–13, inclusive, was $5.59 per ton. The crops harvested in the years 1909–13, inclusive, would, of course, be those falling within the pre-war price parity-base period contemplated in the farm relief bill, namely, August 1909 to July 1914, inclusive. On this latter 5-year base taken as an index of 100 in the farm bill, the index number of prices paid by farmers in the United States for commodities bought was, in December 1932, 106; in January 1933, 105; and in February 1933, 104. If, as was provided in the farm relief bill introduced in the last session, a 3-month moving average were to be applied in administering this provision of the pending bill, it would be necessary to multiply the actual average price of $5.59 as given above by 1.05, which gives $5.865 as the "fair exchange value" contemplated in the pending bill. In the next to the last column of the table on page 15 of the enclosed bulletin on The Agricultural Situation for March 1, 1933 (published by the Department of Agriculture), will be found the full series of index numbers of farm purchasing power since 1910.
> In the case of sugarcane the average price per ton prior to 1914 was not available in the records immediately at hand, and hence I have estimated the prices in 1909–13 on the basis of a study of the relationship between cane prices and beet prices for 1914 to 1931 and of the relationship between cane prices and prices of raw sugar, duty paid, New York, during the same period. Subject to a considerable margin of error, the derived price indicated for sugarcane in 1909–13 is in the neighborhood of $4 per ton. Multiplying this figure by 1.05 would give $4.20 as the "fair exchange value" contemplated in the pending bill.

The foregoing estimate has been checked for me by a competent economist. He reports that farmers received the following rates per ton of sugar beets between 1911 and 1914, and that during those years the New York duty-paid sugar prices, raw and refined, were as set out in the following table:

	Farm price of sugar beets (per ton)	New York duty-paid raw-sugar price	New York refined price
		Cents	Cents
1911	$5.50	4.5	5.345
1912	5.82	4.2	5.041
1913	5.69	3.5	4.278
1914	5.45	3.8	4.683
Average	5.60	4.0	4.8

	Farmers' price for beets (per ton) (average)	New York duty-paid raw-sugar price
		Cents
1930	$7.15	3.387
1931	5.92	3.329
1932	4.22	2.925

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understood the Senator with respect to the amount which, according to this representative of the Department of Agriculture, would be paid to the producer of beets. My understanding is that the beet producer has been receiving approximately from five to six dollars a ton, sometimes $6.50. I do not think it has been as low as $4, certainly not within my recollection. I was wondering where this economist, the representative of the Department of Agriculture, found figures justifying the assertion that $4 had been the price at times paid for sugar beets.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The average price, as first reported by the Department of Agriculture on partial returns, was $5.05 per ton. The later and apparently final figure appears to be $4.22. I may say to the able Senator from Utah that I have here the figures for the country as a whole, and while it is true, as the Senator from Utah has suggested, that the price in earlier years was from five to six dollars a ton, it is my information that, during the past year, in the absence of minimum payments formerly made to farmers by sugar companies, the average price in the country has been as low as indicated.

Mr. KING. The Senator was giving the average throughout the United States?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Precisely.

Mr. KING. I was speaking rather with reference to the prices paid in that part of the United States from which I come, the great State of Utah.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator is fortunate. If the Senator is correct, there will be no grant of benefit payments to the farmers of his State under the amendment; but I suspect that the Senator from Utah will discover on further inquiry that the farmers in his State, according to the latest figures, were not paid in 1932 as liberally as he believes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Confirming the Senator's statement and arithmetic, I should like to testify that the beet-sugar farmers of Michigan—which State, I believe, is the second or third largest producer in the country—were paid $4 a ton on their entire crop last year.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on the basis of the first estimate, it appears that the increase in price of sugar beets over 1932 under the amendment would be approximately 81½ cents, and of sugarcane $1.01. Under the economist's estimate, which appears to be based on later figures, the return on beets would be higher.

Under this later estimate, it appears that in 1932, when the average duty-paid price was 2.925 cents and the average c.i.f. price was 0.925 cent, the farmer received an average of $4.22 per ton of beets—$1.38 per ton below the pre-war level. Recently the c.i.f. Cuban raw-sugar price has been, roughly, 1 cent per pound. The duty on Cuban sugar is 2 cents per pound, which gives a duty-paid price of 3 cents per pound.

Incidentally, the respective prices received by farmers in different years under a 1-cent tariff and under a 2-cent tariff will be noted in the last foregoing tabulation. Under the 1-cent tariff rate prevailing from 1911 to 1914 farmers received an average of $5.60. In 1931, under a 2-cent duty, they were receiving an average of $5.92, and in 1932, still under a 2-cent duty, they were receiving approximately $4.23.

Generally speaking, on a review of sugar-beet and grain prices, there are indications that sugar-beet farmers will require about a 50-percent increase in price to bring their purchasing power back to pre-war levels. A higher percentage of increase will be necessary for grain growers, for the price-of-grain index appears to have fallen between 1913–14 and 1932 by about 50 percent and the price of sugar beets about 25 percent. The statistics apparently further show that the prices of nonagricultural products in 1932 were about equal to those in 1913–14. It is fair to say, therefore, that statistical justification exists for the inclusion of sugar beets and sugar cane in the present bill, and that such inclusion will not operate to produce any but moderate returns to beet and cane growers. Furthermore, if it should develop that under the law in actual operation the Secretary of Agriculture is free to consolidate processors' taxes for the benefit of all specified basic agricultural commodities, there would be manifest advantages in having sugar beets and sugar cane included, since the possibility of securing substantial processors' taxes is nowhere more certain of realization than with respect to sugar.

Enough has been said to make clear that the present motion is not designed for other than temporary farm-relief purposes. It does not attempt to be a final disposition of the sugar problem. With changing conditions, I trust there will be in due time, when the emergency passes, if we are to continue to stimulate our domestic sugar industry, a new approach to an old tariff issue. For the present it should suffice to say to the Senate that farmers in some 19 States will be given some relief from their back-breaking economic perplexities if the amendment now tendered shall be adopted. It is to be hoped that it will not be dismissed as adding complexities to the pending bill. In actual operation the problems of the Secretary of Agriculture may be simplified, rather than complicated, by the adoption of the amendment. Certainly there is no conflict between the provisions for reasonable prices for sugar beets and sugar cane and the marketing provisions of the bill, by means of which it is hoped to make further adjustments for the benefit of all branches of the domestic sugar industry.

Mr. President, in this connection I desire to call attention to an article published on April 16 in the New York Herald Tribune, written by Mr. Ernest K. Lindley, a correspondent of that newspaper, in which it is indicated that the administration is at this time giving consideration to a quota system applied to sugar production and to the marketing of sugar in the United States. This course, if ultimately adopted, will be under the marketing provisions of the bill now before the Senate. No one can read this interesting and presumably authentic suggestion of an administrative program without reaching the conclusion that if it is in prospect with respect to a commodity not enumerated as basic in the bill, there can be no sound reason why that commodity should not be definitely declared basic for such benefits as may accrue in connection with the total program of the Secretary of Agriculture. I request that this article may be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article referred to by the Senator from Colorado will be printed in the RECORD as he requests.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, for the reasons given, I move the adoption of the amendment.

UNITED STATES CONSIDERS SUGAR AID TO PACIFY CUBA—ADMINISTRATION SEEKING ECONOMIC INDUCEMENT TO QUIET UNREST WITHOUT RESORT TO INTERVENTION—TRANSITION REGIME MAY BE SUGGESTED—FIXED MARKET AT BETTER PRICES AMONG MEASURES FORMING IN WASHINGTON

By Ernest K. Lindley

WASHINGTON, April 15.—While it watches the rising tide of political terrorism in Cuba with the closest interest, the administration is quietly feeling its way toward a new Cuban policy which it hopes will furnish a solid foundation for the pacification and economic restoration of the island without American intervention.

The mainspring of the new policy, which has been under discussion for several months, is the allotment to Cuba of a definite quantity of the sugar needed for American consumption. This allotment would be made as part of a comprehensive scheme for controlling the production of sugar in this country and its insular possessions, with the equalizing of supply and demand and a moderate rise in the price of sugar as its main objectives.

The stabilizing of Cuban finances, which rests almost entirely upon sugar, is regarded as necessary to the return of Cuba to more nearly normal political conditions. Although no member of the administration can say as much, for obvious reasons, it is tacitly admitted by well-informed persons that the partial inclusion of Cuba in the American "closed sugar area" would be made contingent upon arrangements for an early free election in Cuba. It has been suggested that a short period of orderly transition might be furnished by agreement between the Machado government and leaders of the opposition on a neutral provisional President chosen outside the ranks of active politicians.

Because of the extreme delicacy of its situation, the administration is saying as little as possible about Cuba. In response to questions, Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, said today that the administration was giving no thought to intervention in Cuba. He emphasized that the relations of the United States to Cuba were those of one sovereign nation to another. He said that the only action with regard to Cuba that the administration was considering was the appointment of an Ambassador, just as it is appointing Ambassadors to other nations as rapidly as possible.

The administration's desire to avoid intervention in Cuba, if it is possible, is attributable partly to the cost, but preponderantly to its hope of maintaining and improving friendly relationships between this country and Latin America as a whole.

A disruption in Cuba which would bring the question of intervention to a head would be most unwelcome at this time, when the administration is conducting conversations preliminary to the world economic conference. Some of the results which the administration hopes to achieve, particularly in the way of tariff agreements and the controlled production of such commodities as wheat, copper, and silver, will demand warm cooperation with Latin America.

Although President Roosevelt has not taken official cognizance of the fact, persons close to him have been discussing the possibilities of controlling sugar production with representatives of all the leading sugar interests. In these discussions the following allotments have been suggested:

	Tons
American beet	1,100,000
Louisiana cane	200,000
Hawaii	900,000
Philippines	850,000
Puerto Rico	850,000
Cuba	2,000,000
Total	5,900,000

American consumption ranges from 5,500,000 to 6,000,000 tons annually.

FARM BILL LOOPHOLE CITED

Discussing the sugar problem, persons close to the administration have pointed out that the machinery for applying an allotment system and for lifting the price lies in the marketing features of the farm relief bill. Sugar is not mentioned in the bill, but the Secretary of Agriculture is empowered to extend control to competing commodities, among which sugar might be classed.

The advisability of lowering the tariff for the amount of sugar allotted to Cuba also has been discussed. At present Cuban sugar is entitled to a 20-percent preferential, but the Cuban producers have complained that in the recent demoralized state of the sugar market they have not been able to take advantage of the preferential, and that it has gone to the refiners instead. It is informally estimated that if the Cuban producer can net 1 cent or a little more a pound for raw sugar, Cuba can survive economically. The Cuban sugar crop has been brought down already from its maximum of more than 5,000,000 tons in 1928–29 to approximately 2,000,000 tons in the 1932–33 season. If the President receives from Congress the right to make tariff reductions up to 50 percent in negotiating reciprocal agreements, a 50 percent preferential for Cuban sugar would become possible without further congressional action.

CHADBOURNE BUSY IN CAPITAL

Because of the relatively small number of sugar refineries, it has been pointed out that sugar should be easier to control than most farm commodities. The possibilities of such control implicit in the farm relief bill have occasioned a great deal of discussion among representatives of sugar interests in Washington. Thomas L. Chadbourne, head of the committee appointed by American banking interests to work out a plan for the Cuban sugar industry in 1930 and author of the international "Chadbourne plan" signed in 1931, is understood to have been active here in recent weeks. However, the administration is not expected to take official note of Mr. Chadbourne's activities. Sugar representatives here have satisfied themselves that Mr. Chadbourne is not en rapport with the new administration. During the preconvention campaign, it is recalled, Mr. Chadbourne made a particularly bitter attack on Mr. Roosevelt. Furthermore, the impression prevails here that to consummate a satisfactory arrangement involving Cuba, fresh faces and fresh hands will have to be brought into the picture.

Charles W. Taussig, president of the American Molasses Co., a concern with Cuban properties, has been particularly active in sounding sugar interests on the plan for production control. Mr. Taussig is a member of the Roosevelt "brains trust", being a particularly close friend of Prof. A. A. Berle. Mr. Taussig and Professor Berle visited Cuba during the winter and conferred with Mr. Roosevelt at Warm Springs on their return.

About that time the group of Cuban exiles in Miami, led by Gen. Mario G. Menocal, former President of Cuba, ostensibly was making preparations for armed revolution against the Machado government. The alternative purposes of the opposition were to overthrow the Machado government or to force American intervention. A few weeks before March 4 word reached the Cuban revolutionary colony that if they would desist and bide their time a more peaceful means of solving the Cuban problem might be evolved by the incoming administration in Washington.

NEW LEADERS HELD NEEDED

The apparent thesis of the administration is that until a minimum of economic subsistence is assured to Cuba no government can expect to endure there without the use of extreme force. At the same time it is privately and unofficially observed here that the deep hatreds built up during the period of force and terrorism make it unlikely that Cuba can return to normal political life except under new leadership which has not been closely identified with any faction in the struggle.

With a new Ambassador on the ground and the power to make economic concessions to Cuba, the evident hope of the administration is that the Cuban problem can be solved with full regard for the amenities between sovereign nations, as well as for the country's special responsibilities to the island Republic.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the Senator from Colorado takes his seat will he yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COSTIGAN. With pleasure.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I heartily concur with the Senator's suggestion that sugar beets and cane sugar are among the basic commodities that ought to be covered by the bill. I want to be sure, however, that I understand his calculations. He has quoted several authorities and has submitted several calculations. What is the Senator's final judgment as to the amount which it is necessary to add in order to accomplish parity in respect to the price of sugar beets?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As defined in the proposed act?

Mr. VANDENBERG. As defined in the proposed act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. For the reasons assigned, approximately $1 per ton, in my judgment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator indicate what that increase would represent in respect to the addition to the tariff rate which must be made under the compensating section of the bill?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have made no calculation on that assumption, I will say to the able Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It would increase the sugar tariff by a proportionate amount, would it not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I read the bill, the processor's tax on all sugar, both domestic and imported, does not constitute an increase in the sugar tariff; so that the relation continues the same, if I understand the question of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I make this statement? Under the terms of this bill whatever amount is added to the price of the commodity by virtue of the imposition of the tax, automatically the identical amount is added to the existing tariff. To illustrate, if there were a duty of 2½ cents a pound on sugar, refined or raw, whatever it might be, and this tax should raise the price of sugar to 5 cents a pound, then the duty on sugar would be 7½ cents a pound.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado a further question. I was particularly challenged by the observation in his initial remarks respecting a sliding scale of tariffs upon sugar. Does the Senator agree that in the final analysis the answer to the sugar question, if it is to be a tariff answer, should be on the basis of a sliding scale which would reduce the tariff in inverse ratio as the price advantage goes to the consumer?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is my judgment at the present time. Of course there should be minimum and maximum limits within which any such rule would be applied.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I want to take advantage, Mr. President, of the opportunity cordially to subscribe to the doctrine announced in that aspect by the Senator from Colorado and to say that if the sugar-tariff question, perplexing and irritating as it always is, could be reduced to that formula, we would have done great service, not only to our own tariff difficulties but also to the welfare of the consuming public in this country.

One further question, if the Senator from Colorado will bear with me. Do I understand that he considers that the adoption of this amendment would be in the nature of establishing the philosophy of bounties upon sugar as an alternative to tariffs on sugar?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have assumed that the bill, in effect, applies the bounty principle to all basic commodities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Was not the bounty principle tried upon sugar in the 1890's and was it not promptly repealed?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was tried in 1890 under the McKinley law, as the Senator from Michigan well knows, and approximately $36,000,000 was paid in the form of bounties to sugar producers in the United States as a result of that experiment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Why was the bounty withdrawn?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Subsequently, as the Senator knows, the Bounty Act was repealed, as I recall, under a Democratic administration, and the Republicans subsequently favored the tariff to stimulate the industry. In other words, they substituted a tariff bounty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct. I was wondering if there was any analogy. My recollection is that there was a very profound reaction in the country against the subsidizing of sugar with a bounty at that time.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There was a contention, as the Senator knows, that the bounty was unconstitutional. That question was taken to the courts. It was never precisely determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, but that Court did sustain an act of Congress, passed about 1895, which provided for payment of amounts regarded as due under the act providing for the bounty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado for his generosity to me in this exchange of questions. I simply want to add that sugar beets are unquestionably not only one of the basic commodities of the country, as the Senator has indicated, but certainly one of the most useful commodities of agriculture itself, not only in respect to the utility of the land and fertilization, not only in respect to revenue to the farmer, but also in relationship to the public welfare and the national defense, because we must be self-sustaining in this respect. Therefore, if I may be permitted to join with the Senator from Colorado, it seems to me that if we are to proceed into this experiment, most certainly the Senator's amendment is justified and should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill fundamentally is to take care of those commodities produced in America of which we have an exportable surplus. One of the main features of the bill is what is known as the "leasing provision", under which it is proposed to tax the processors of certain commodities in order to raise sufficient funds with which to pay for the elimination of land which is producing a surplus, such surplus reacting in further depressing prices. Now, as I understand, we have before us a proposition to reverse that process. We produce only about one sixth of the sugar used in America. By what method of procedure is it possible, under the terms of the bill and in view of the purposes of the bill, to increase the production of sugar to such an extent as that it can ever be hoped to raise within the period of the emergency a sufficient quantity to supply the American people?

We have had for years the notorious fights and some scandals in connection with the sugar industry and the tariffs imposed for its benefit. One of the slogans of the party to which I belong was that by the tariff on sugar we were taxing the breakfast table of every American citizen, taxing a commodity used and universally necessary; yet in spite of all our tariff duties, in spite of scandalous protection at times, we have not been able to produce in America more than one sixth of the amount of sugar the country requires.

I am not going to pretend to enter into any discussion of the policy of the protective theory. I think the present condition of the country is sufficient argument against it without my trying to make any. I think we have arrived at a point in that regard where we are confronted by a fact and not a theory, and I hope that this bill, complex and complicated as it is, will not be further burdened with the reverse of a reduction of production by attempting through a bonus to increase production. I hope the amendment may not be agreed to because it will renew a controversial point which should not, in my opinion, be reopened at this time.

I sympathize with the Senator who has offered the amendment. I know how agriculture suffers in every phase and form. The fact of the matter is the country seems to think that the farmer's duty is to suffer; that he is born for the purpose of bearing the burdens of the remainder of the American people, and, therefore, he should not be considered in the ordinary scheme of things. The fact is that up until now he has not been considered, and even now I do not think we are in a fair way to get him to the point where he will be very greatly considered. With all the sympathy in the world for the proposal of the Senator from Colorado I submit that this measure has now about all it can carry.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina knows the respect I entertain for him. Therefore nothing that I shall say will be critical of his remarks. However, I should say to the Senate that some days ago I spoke to the able Senator who has the bill in charge with reference to this amendment, and his response in effect was that there is no reason why the amendment should not be incorporated in the bill, and that any commodity upon which communities are dependent for their prosperity at this time may properly be added under the theory which prevails with respect to the bill as it is now drafted.

That statement is strengthened by what took place this afternoon in the Senate. We have added to the bill a southern-grown commodity. No one contended here and the Senator from South Carolina did not argue that that commodity should be excluded from the bill. It is, I assume, not pretended that in the period of the emergency enough peanuts will be grown in the United States to meet the Senator's test. The opposition now manifested by the able Senator from South Carolina was not exhibited when the issue concerned that southern-grown commodity.

I take it that the bill is a farm relief bill, and that the original provision for basic commodities is designed to give farm relief in part by raising prices of basic commodities to their pre-war levels by the method set out in the bill. Farmers' prices of milk and its products are to be raised. Rice is to be raised to the pre-war level. The purpose and plan are to give farm assistance. If the purpose and plan are to be followed, they should be extended to the beet grower. This is something different from the tariff. I am simply stating that if the country desires to pursue the policy of the bill, it should extend it. If it desires to give benefit payments to the farmers of the country, there is no argument for withholding benefit payments from the sugar-beet and sugar-cane growers of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator from Colorado has quoted me correctly. He brought the amendment to me and, thinking along general lines, I then saw no reason why this commodity along with others might not be added to the bill. But when I gave more serious thought to the fact that sugar is an indispensable article in every family in America—not only in every family but in many of our industries—I came to another conclusion. That is not true with reference to peanuts. They are a substitute for making a living that may or may not be taken by the American people, but they are taken and have advanced to where they are a considerable industry in the country.

But they do not come anywhere within the same category as sugar. There is nothing produced in the fields of America outside of actual bread and clothing that bears the same relation to the American people that sugar does. It is a notorious fact that after all the years of our experimentation and our bonuses and our tariffs, we fall short of supplying more than one sixth of that commodity. We have succeeded in supplying the world with cotton. We have succeeded in supplying America with wheat. We have produced corn and substitutes for it in abundance. We have substitutes for nearly every form of agricultural product outside of the two great staple products, namely, textiles and wheat. The animal industry producing wool and the vegetable producing cotton amply supply the American need. But this indispensable article of sugar we cannot produce in sufficient quantity and have not done so. From the foundation of this Government until today we have been trying by all means and methods, by experimentation, by bonuses and tariffs, to bring about an adequate production of sugar.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. Can the Senator account for the low price of sugar under those conditions in view of the fact that we do not produce anything like as much as we consume?

Mr. SMITH. I account for it on the very identical principle that I account for the fact that productive land, agricultural land upon which the Senator and I are dependent for our food and our clothing, has no market. We do not import any land. We do not export any land. It is a fixture. Our population is increasing every day. The need for adequate clothing and food is increasing every day. Yet on account of that—which I shall not discuss now, but before this matter is ended I am going to take time to express myself more adequately about our miserable financial system than I have heretofore done—the reason why sugar is so low in price is because the people have not the money with which to buy it. That is all.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it not just as important to the person growing sugar beets and sugar cane that he shall get an adequate price for his product as it is to those growing wheat and cotton and peanuts?

Mr. SMITH. But we have a law for that which we are enforcing, known as the "tariff law". It was tried out on wheat, but it could not accomplish anything because wheat is so universally grown and the numbers engaged in its production so great and their resources so impossible that when we put a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat it practically went down 40 cents a bushel, proving that the man who bought it had the power to pay what he pleased in the face of and in defiance of the tariff law. Had the wheat growers been organized like the steel producers we would not be here with this bill. They would sell to the market at the tariff price and ship the surplus at the world price without any law. The same is true of cotton.

The reason why tariffs do us no good and are a mockery is because we have to take the price that is offered on account of our poverty and lack of resources and the numerous ones engaged in its production without financial resources. I have stood here for 24 years and seen the mockery of the Republican Party attempting to put a tariff on farm products when they knew that it was worse than useless because the man that buys it fixes the price, and not the tariff.

In the case of sugar we have certain combinations which I have never adequately understood that have been able somehow or other to divide with the producers of sugar and keep them in the line of the high protectionists. I have seen Senators from Louisiana sit here, Democrats on everything but sugar, who would jump the fence whenever sugar was mentioned. [Laughter.] That disease spreads somewhat to other States. I saw it exemplified here not long ago. I saw certain Senators here who on the platform have denounced the high protective "robber" tariff, but when it came to their respective States they said, "Yes; this is a very small item, so I think I will take a shot at it just for my own home State." [Laughter.]

During the last session of Congress I stood here the loneliest man in America, the only man on this floor who voted against every schedule in that wonderful piece of legislation known as the Smoot-Hawley bill, and then I voted against the bill itself. I do not believe I had a comrade on the notoriously Democratic side. They seemed to be going on the theory of an old Senator who was once here when he said, "As long as good stealing is going on, give me my share." [Laughter.] I prefer to do without my share and stand by a principle. Unfortunately, the principle of the high protective tariff is in this very farm bill raised to the *n*th power, reaching to where it is an embargo, and yet we call ourselves Democrats.

Mr. President, I want to say here now, because it is more convenient for me to say it now than possibly any other time and because I want to get through with the bill, that I have never voted for a high protective tariff and as long as I am a Jeffersonian Democrat I am not going to do it. I believe that a false principle wrought into real life will work itself out in disaster. From the days of Alexander Hamilton down to date that false principle has distressed the American people until in the years 1930, 1931, and 1932 it worked itself out in unspeakable disaster for the American people. However, Mr. President, I did not intend to get started on the tariff and I am not going to continue any further on that subject.

Mr. President, I should like to have a vote on this question; and then I think we should take a recess, unless the leader desires an executive session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a number of Senators have left, and they do not expect a vote until in the morning. I think we ought to be able to dispose of this bill tomorrow; and I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he move a recess until 11 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice now that we will meet tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock; and if we do not finish the bill during the day I am going to use every effort to get my colleagues to stay here continuously tomorrow night until we do finish it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask that two amendments which I send to the desk may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. McCARRAN. I present two amendments to the pending bill and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H.R. 48. An act to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans.;

H.R. 1596. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Pee Dee River and a bridge across the Waccamaw River, both at or near Georgetown, S. C.;

H.R. 4127. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Waccamaw River near Conway, S.C.;

H.R. 4225. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Parkers Landing, in the county of Armstrong, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania;

H.R. 4332. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Allegheny River at a point near the Forest-Venango County line, in Tionesta Township, and in the county of Forest, and in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

H.R. 4491. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, to construct a free overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio; to the Committee on Commerce.

H.J.Res. 93. Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

H.J.Res. 135. Joint resolution to amend section 2 of the act approved February 4, 1933, to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

JAMES A. DONAHOE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, out of order, and as in executive session, on behalf of the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably from that committee, for the Executive Calendar, the nomination of James A. Donahoe, of Nebraska, to be United States district judge, district of Nebraska, to succeed Joseph W. Woodrough, nominated to be United States circuit judge, eighth circuit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, as in executive session, the report will be received and placed on the Executive Calendar.

EDITORIALS FROM BOISE CAPITAL NEWS

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two brief editorials from the Boise Capital News of April 5. They seem particularly appropriate to the time.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOW IT'S MOSTLY UP TO YOU

This newspaper has been happy—and proud—to record the rebirth of American confidence in America in the past few weeks.

But confidence without determined effort to back it up will prove futile. This wave of better feeling that sweeps the Nation will be but a flash in the pan without good, honest, shoulder-to-the-wheel drive behind it.

The people, as usual, will get exactly that to which they are entitled—and no more.

The question of high governmental costs is not solved just because Roosevelt has shown the way. Every branch of government must be made to follow the Roosevelt path. Our public officials must be forced to march up that trail.

The new deal means a better deal for our people. How long it remains so depends entirely on the people. And Roosevelt will remain potent only as long as the people back him up.

Today, the people will a thing; Roosevelt does it.

If we wish him to keep doing things we must keep willing them; eternally smash our enemies; constantly battle for the right.

As a people, we glory in our new-found power; and in our new-found way to make that power effective. Roosevelt has done what he has done simply because the public mind made itself felt throughout the Nation.

Let us not rest on our laurels. The enemies of the public weal are not inactive just because they are not out in the open. They never sleep; they fight as hard today as ever. With any let-down in public aggressiveness they will come out into the open again to make our victory a hollow one.

Fight on, America!

TWO POETS WRITE AN EDITORIAL

We offer two poems, the sentiment of which seems appropriate to the times. First, one from Alfred Austin:

"So long as faith with freedom reigns,
And loyal hope survives,
And gracious charity remains
To leaven lowly lives;
While there is one untrodden tract
For intellect or will,
And men are free to think and act
Life is worth living still."

Then, Josiah Gilbert Holland's famous lines:

"God give us men. A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and willing hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagog
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty, and in private thinking."

"AMERICA NEEDS STABLE MONEY"—ARTICLE BY CLARENCE POE

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Dr. Clarence Poe, editor of the Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist, stating what the necessities of the farmers of America are, and entitled "America Needs Stable Money."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA NEEDS STABLE MONEY

(By Clarence Poe, editor of the Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist; member Agricultural Committee, United States Chamber of Commerce)

Why permit our national standard of value—the dollar—to be as variable as a bushel measure that is sometimes 3 pecks, sometimes 5 pecks, in capacity?

For business recovery, one of America's greatest needs is stable money—an "honest dollar." And fortunately American business and American agriculture seem ready—or almost ready—to unite in this demand.

To find out just what the farmer wants, let us examine the resolutions adopted at the recent annual meetings of the two most powerful national farm organizations: the American Farm Bureau and the National Grange.

Meeting in Winston-Salem, on November 24, the Grange declared for a national monetary policy which will "secure restoration of the wholesale-price average of 1926 as computed by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics and the stabilization of the price level as nearly as practicable at that point."

Two weeks later, in Chicago, the American Farm Bureau Federation likewise set forth the following as the fundamental objective to be sought for: "That the index figure of the average commodity prices prevailing from 1920 to 1929 shall be adopted as the base for calculation at 100; and, that it shall be the policy of the United States to establish and maintain the commodity price level at that point as near as is humanly possible."

It will be noticed that the Grange suggests stabilizing the dollar on the basis of 1926 prices, and the Farm Bureau on the basis of average 1920–29 prices. But 1926 prices were almost identically the 1920–29 average, so there is no conflict here.

How the dollar has changed

1920	$0.65

So much for the voice of organized agriculture. Now, let us consider a few typical business opinions. He is reputedly the wealthiest man in America, but just 30 days before the National Grange meeting Mr. Henry Ford said: "The next big job is to improve the money system. I am convinced that our money system is antiquated. We have plenty of men and plenty of material; but money, which is not so important as men or material, is holding up progress."

He is head of America's greatest business organization, but the next week after the American Farm Bureau met, President Henry I. Harriman of the United States Chamber of Commerce told the American Association of Life Insurance Presidents that five things are absolutely necessary for business recovery, no. 4 being as follows: "That we have a dollar whose purchasing power neither markedly increases nor decreases through a reasonable period of years; that is, a dollar whose value remains substantially constant with the general price index of commodities."

It is the journalistic spokesman of a great group of American business men, and not farmers, but the Business Week of New York City said recently: "The only remaining road to recovery for ourselves and the world is by concerted and courageous action, through governments and central banks, to raise the commodity price level and reduce the value of gold to the level at which it was when the bulk of the world's public and private debt burdens were contracted. Otherwise universal bankruptcy, default, and repudiation are unavoidable."

In our recent national campaign both major political parties declared for a "sound currency." The latest edition of Webster's International Dictionary carrying the term defines it as follows:

"Sound currency, a currency whose actual value is the same as its nominal value; a currency which does not deteriorate or depreciate or fluctuate in comparison with the standard of values."

Judged by this standard I submit that we now have no sound currency. We have no stable currency. We have no currency "which does not fluctuate in comparison with the standard of values" if we accept either commodity prices or general purchasing power as a standard. We not only have no such sound currency now, but we have not had one for years.

Consider what Dr. E. W. Kemmerer, the distinguished Princeton University economist, said at a meeting of the Stable Money Association 5 years ago:

"There is probably no defect in the world's economic organization today more serious than the fact that we use as our unit of value not a thing with a fixed value but a fixed weight of gold with a widely varying value. In a little less than a half century here in the United States we have seen our yardstick of value, namely, the value of a gold dollar, exhibit the following gyrations: From 1879 to 1896 it rose 27 percent; from 1896 to 1920 it fell 70 percent; from 1920 to September 1927 it rose 56 percent. If, figuratively speaking, we say that the yardstick of value was 36 inches long in 1879, when the United States returned to the gold standard, then it was 46 inches long in 1896, 13.5 inches long in 1920, and is 21 inches long today."

And since 1927 the situation then so effectively described by Dr. Kemmerer has not improved. Rather it has steadily gone from bad to worse, as is proved by the following official statistics of the Department of Labor, showing the purchasing power of the dollar expressed in terms of wholesale prices of 784 commodities (properly weighted), taking average 1926 prices as 100 or $1:

The fluctuating dollar

Year:	Purchasing power of $1
1916	$1.17
1917	.85
1918	.76
1919	.72
1920	.65
1921	1.02
1922	1.03
1923	.99
1924	1.02
1925	.95
1926	1.00
1927	1.05
1928	1.02
1929	1.04
1930	1.16
1931 (Jan.)	1.30
1931 (Dec.)	1.41
1932 (Mar.)	1.50
1932 (Sept.)	1.53
1933 (Jan. 14–21)	1.63

What could be more eloquent than this table in proving that we have no stable standard of values or purchasing power, no "sound currency that does not deteriorate or depreciate or fluctuate in comparison with the standard of values"? We have a standard of time that never varies—the hour; a standard of length that never varies—the yard; a standard for liquids that never varies—the gallon; a standard for measuring corn and wheat that never varies—the bushel.

And yet our national standard of value—the dollar—in real purchasing power, interpreted in terms of what it will buy, we permit to be as variable as would be a yardstick sometimes 18, sometimes 24, and sometimes 36 inches long; as variable as would be a bushel measure sometimes 2 pecks, sometimes 3 pecks, sometimes 4 pecks in capacity; as variable as if we had hours sometimes 30, sometimes 45, and sometimes 60 minutes in length.

President Hoover recently quoted Daniel Webster's declaration: "The prosperity of the working people lives, moves, and has its being in established credit and a steady medium of payment." Certainly nothing could be less "steady" or "established" than a medium of payment varying as shockingly as the value of a dollar in terms of general commodities. We find the financial committee of the League of Nations reporting that whereas in 1928 it took 100 units of commodities to pay a debt of 100 gold units, today it requires 170 units of commodities. We find that it takes 278 percent as much farm products to pay an average Federal land bank debt or interest payment as when the debt was created. And who can deny that these penalties represent a ghastly and flagrant perversion of essential morality?

As C. V. Gregory says: "If Congress had passed a law in 1926 requiring every debtor to pay back $1.50 for every $1 he had borrowed, besides interest, we would have had a revolution. Yet that is just what deflation has done. Suppose Congress had passed a law in 1926 doubling the size of the bushel basket or the number of pounds in a bushel and had told us that in measuring out products to pay our debts we must give the same number of bushels of grain, but measure it out in these new and enlarged bushel baskets. By failing to take action to stabilize the value of money Congress has done what amounts to the same thing."

All business has suffered from this disastrous situation, but agriculture more than any other industry, because the price of farm products has dropped out of proportion to all other commodities. Farm products, which in 1928 would buy only 90 percent as much goods as in pre-war days, dropped to a ratio of 80 percent in 1930, to 63 in 1931, and now to 50. Only a few weeks ago a Midwestern banker summarized the iniquity of the farmer's present debt burden by saying:

"In our country farmers are loaded with debts—mortgages they contracted back in 1918 and 1919. Wheat that was $3.31 then is 47 cents now. Rye $1.90 then, 30 cents now. Then oats brought $1; now, 18 cents. Corn, $1.60; now, 30 cents. Hogs, 23 cents a pound then; 4 cents now. But the farmer's mortgage still remains. He pays, nominally, from 5 to 7 percent on it.

"But, as a matter of fact, he must pay from 25 to 35 percent, because he has got to sell five times as much produce now to pay that interest as he did at the peak. If he borrowed $5,000 back there in the peak days, he borrowed the equivalent of 1,515 bushels of wheat. But to pay off the same $5,000 now takes 10,640 bushels of wheat."

Of course, this is an extreme illustration, but the general principle applies in millions of cases. The difference is one of degree rather than kind. When a debt is contracted and the dollars loaned represent 10 bales of cotton or 500 bushels of wheat, it is immoral for the governments and financial systems of the earth to make it so that the creditor collects dollars which represent 30 bales of cotton or 1,500 bushels of wheat (and in similar proportions as regards all other commodities). In addition, all interest payments have been correspondingly increased. When this happens a robbery has been permitted as essentially immoral as the burglary of a home, or the hold-up of a train, or any pocket picking by modern thieves and gangsters.

When such a system results in the loss of homes, the destruction of educational opportunity for boys and girls, the failure of the sick to receive proper medical and hospital treatment, and the engulfing of millions in unjustifiable misery, the situation indeed cries aloud for remedy.

What is the remedy? Not the abolition of the gold standard, in the opinion of leaders in agriculture and business, but the maintenance of the gold standard with adjustment to the commodity index to insure stability as "the only way to perpetuate the gold standard", in the language of the American Farm Bureau.

The organized farmers of America are asking for no fiat money, no printing-press money, no 16-to-1 free silver. They are asking for a money system stabilized on the basis of the average purchasing power of a dollar in the years 1920–30, when most of America's staggering burden of public and private debt was created. Gold as a basis for currency could still be maintained, but the quantity of gold in the dollar would be adjusted to a commodity index. No doubt there are several methods by which such a stable currency, or sound currency, may be established.

For example, instead of making actual gold coin the basis of our currency, some such plan as that of Dr. Irving Fisher, of Yale, could be adopted. Gold bullion could be stored in the United States Treasury and certificates issued against it (just as in the case of our silver-certificate dollar bills in general use), saying in effect: "This certifies that there has been deposited in the Treasury of the United States gold bullion equal in average purchasing power to that of one gold dollar in 1920–30," etc.

The French plan of redeeming such certificates only in gold bars in a value aggregating about $11,000 could be adopted. And Congress could levy a maximum "excess profits" tax on creditors who demand payment in gold dollars of former weight and fineness, or in some way prevent such extortion—on the valid ground that this policy calls for the repayment of greater values than the debtor received.

Somehow or other some plan for stabilizing the dollar must be effected. It is necessary in order to secure a just settlement—or, in fact, any real settlement at all—of America's present crushing burden of public and private debt. It is necessary in order to alleviate present disorders in foreign exchange. It is necessary in order that creditors who lend, as well as debtors who borrow, shall know what actual values in goods or real purchasing power will be given or received when pay time comes.

Cautious creditors now specify that debts shall be payable in gold dollars "of present standard and weight and fineness", with the result that this may mean anywhere from 64.8 cents to $1.63 in purchasing power, as it has meant in the last 16 years, and thus affords no genuine protection even to creditors. But with the adoption of the commodity index dollar creditors could make sure of a settlement fair alike to borrower and lender by specifying in the contract: "If the value of the dollar as determined by the aforementioned commodity price index is hereafter increased or decreased by congressional action, then the amount of this loan in dollars shall be correspondingly increased or decreased." Both borrower and lender would in this way be safeguarded.

It is indeed gratifying that at last American agriculture seems sufficiently conservative and American business sufficiently progressive to unite in a demand for genuinely stable money. After the tragic experiences America has just been through all commerce will lag, all business will halt, all enterprise will be frightened, all development on the farm and in business will be checked, if every man must make future plans with no assurance as to whether the dollar at pay time will be worth 50 cents, $1, $1.50, or $2 in commodity values. It is a problem that must and can be solved.

While the foregoing figures show how the value of the dollar fluctuates in terms of all commodities, its fluctuation in terms of farm commodities have been even more severe and disastrous. If a farmer made a debt so recently as 1930 it now takes—in addition to interest—an average of 129 percent more farm products to pay the principal than then. In the following table one can (1) see what year any farm debt was made and see (2) how much the principal itself has increased in quantity of farm products required to pay it off (in addition to similar increase in all interest charges):

Year debt made:	Increase in debt (percent)

INVESTIGATION OF DIRIGIBLE DISASTERS

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to call up House Concurrent Resolution 15, relative to the investigation of the Akron disaster, which has been reported back to the Senate with an amendment. It will take only a moment or two.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few days ago, when this report was made, I objected to the consideration of the concurrent resolution. I understand, however, that it has passed the House and has been referred to the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs and favorably reported, and also has gone to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and is now reported out with an amendment. Is that the situation?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 15) creating a joint committee to investigate the causes of the wrecks of dirigibles, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment, on page 2, line 18, after the word "advisable", to insert a comma and the words "not exceeding $5,000, one half of said amount to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one half out of the contingent fund of the House", so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby created a joint committee to consist of 5 Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 5 Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The committee shall select its own chairman.

Such committee is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the cause or causes of the wreck of the Navy dirigible Akron and the wrecks of other Army and Navy dirigibles, to fix responsibility for the same, to inquire generally into the question of the utility of dirigibles in the military and naval establishments, and to make recommendations to the Senate and House of Representatives with respect to the future use of dirigibles for military or naval purposes. The committee shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions or recesses of the present Congress, to employ such experts, clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable, not exceeding $5,000, one half of said amount to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one half out of the contingent fund of the House.

Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee and shall be served by any person designated by him. The provisions of sections 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to any person summoned as a witness under the authority of this resolution in the same manner as such provisions are applicable to any person summoned as a witness in the case of an inquiry before a committee of either House.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 19, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 18, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who madest the heavens and taketh up the stars as little things, whose oceans are as the palm of Thine hand and to whom the isles of the sea are as dust in the balance, Thou art the mighty and the everlasting God. We rejoice this hour because Thou dost bend to the earth, that all suffering humanity may be lifted up and saved. Gracious Heavenly Father, we praise Thee that there is nothing in all the world so patient, nothing so generous, nothing so considerate, nothing so long-suffering as the teachings of Thy only begotten Son. As we live on His levels, so shall we share in His strength, and faintness and failure cannot abound. Intrusted with these offices which we are to discharge, may they be expressed in good conscience, wise principle, and altogether in becoming behavior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the House of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 73. An act to authorize the Comptroller General to allow claim of district no. 13, Choctaw County, Okla., for payment of tuition for Indian pupils.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have until midnight tonight to file a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, that is the rule, I presume, about changing the discharge rule?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. I should like to know what arrangement has been made about time for those of us on this side who desire to oppose any change in the rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman will recall that in Rules Committee today it was generally agreed that when the rule was called up, there would be 4 hours' debate on the resolution to change the rule, one half in favor and one half opposed to the rule. Of course, this will have to be obtained in the House under unanimous consent.

Mr. PATMAN. I withdraw any reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I understand the gentleman from New York to say that the committee would report by tomorrow?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; the request was that we have until midnight tonight to report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the following committees may have today and tomorrow to file reports regardless of whether the House is in session or not, Ways and Means, Military Affairs, and Banking and Currency.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I presume the gentleman's request includes the filing of minority views also?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, certainly. I should have stated that in my request.

Mr. SNELL. And such views would be incorporated with the report?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TRUAX, for 4 days, on account of death in family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p.m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Thursday, April 20, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CLAIM OF JOHN L. SUMMERS, DISBURSING CLERK, ET AL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of proposed legislation to provide relief for and to adjust certain accounts of John L. Summers, disbursing clerk, Treasury Department; Frank White and H. T. Tate, former Treasurers of the United States; Guy F. Allen, former Acting Treasurer of the United States; Robert G. Hilton, former Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Baltimore, Md.; the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency for the period from April 5, 1912, to November 21, 1928; and to cover the settlement of outstanding claims of certain individuals, representing unrecovered amounts due them, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

FUNCTIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE (S.DOC. NO. 36)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in compliance with Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a report as to the functions and activities of the Department, showing the total number of employees, the salaries and wages paid and other expenditures, the source of available funds, and the statutory authority for the Department to conduct its various activities; also a list of all employees whose compensation is $5,000 per annum or more, which, with the accompanying statements, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a telegram from Peter Williams, director Indians of California, Inc., Klamath, Calif., relative to the qualifications of Hon. John Collier to serve as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of the South Shore Small Home and Property Owners Defense League, of South Shore, Staten Island, N.Y., expressing appreciation of the President's efforts for the relief of home owners, but favoring a more complete program of relief, providing, among other things, for "no foreclosures or tax sales on small homes or pieces of property owned by workers or small business men", etc., which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Foreign Commerce Club of New York, Inc., and the board of directors of the American Manufacturers Export Association, both of New York City, N.Y., favoring the negotiation of treaties with foreign nations providing for mutual concessions in tariff duties for the promotion of reciprocal trade, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Men's Club of Temple Beth Emeth, of Flatbush, Brooklyn, N.Y., condemning the persecution of, and alleged outrages perpetrated upon, the Jews in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by members of the Young Folks League of the Yeshivah of Bensonhurst, Brooklyn, N.Y., favoring action by the Government, through diplomatic channels, looking to the protection of American citizens and the Jews in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens, members of the Martin Street Parent-Teacher Association, of Wellsville, N.Y., praying for the passage of legislation to regulate the motion-picture industry, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Finger Lakes Post, No. 961, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Ithaca, N.Y., favoring compulsory military training of young men in the colleges and high schools, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens, being railroad employees, of Buffalo, N.Y., favoring the passage of the so-called "Hatfield-Keller bill", providing retirement pay to railroad employees, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a telegram from the Hornell (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce, embodying a resolution adopted by that organization endorsing Federal highway aid as a means of relieving unemployment, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Pampanga Civic Union, San Fernando, Pampanga, P.I., favoring the granting of complete and immediate independence to the Philippine Islands, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Typographical Union No. 6, of New York City, N.Y., favoring the passage of the so-called "Black-Connery 30-hour-week work bill", and the inclusion therein of the newspaper and periodical industry, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Bayridge Branch, United Irish Societies of New York, Inc., of Brooklyn, N.Y., favoring the passage of the so-called "Black 30-hour-week work bill", particularly as to its effect on working hours of railroad employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for the passage of legislation to guarantee bank deposits, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Montgomery County, Md., praying for the continuation of appropriations for Federal vocational education, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Mike Holm, secretary of state of the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy with record of the original instrument in my office of H.F. No. 1874, being Resolution No. 18 of the Laws of Minnesota, 1933, as filed in this office on the 15th day of April A.D. 1933, and that said copy is a true and correct transcript of said instrument and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in St. Paul, this 17th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to enact legislation for the refinancing of outstanding drainage bond indebtedness

Whereas many of the counties of the State of Minnesota, in common with a large number of drainage districts and communities of other States of the Nation, have large issues of drainage improvement bonds due and outstanding which were issued for drainage works planned and constructed during times of normal prosperous conditions; and

Whereas under the distressing economic conditions which have for the past several years affected agriculture, the payment of such bonds and other obligations and interest thereon has become impossible in many sections affected thereby by reason of the inability of farmers to meet installments on their drainage and other taxes and assessments; and

Whereas legislation is pending before the Congress of the United States aiming to extend Federal aid for the refinancing of outstanding drainage bond indebtedness by extending the time in which drainage costs are to be paid and reducing the rate of interest: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the senate concurring), That we must earnestly urge the Congress of the United States to pass legislation providing relief to hard-pressed counties and drainage districts on account of drainage bond indebtedness at the earliest possible time; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Minnesota be instructed to send copies of this resolution to both Houses of Congress and to each Member in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
K. K. SOLBERG,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house of representatives the 3d day of April 1933.
FRANK T. STARKEY,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Passed the senate the 7th day of April 1933.
G. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved April 15, 1933.
FLOYD B. OLSON,
Governor of the State of Minnesota.

Filed April 15, 1933.
MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of the State of Minnesota.

EMPLOYMENT IN REFORESTATION WORK

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram from the town clerk of Miami, Ariz., embodying resolutions adopted by the mayor and common council of that town, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIAMI, ARIZ., April 18, 1933.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Care of United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

A resolution for promoting work for the residents of the Globe-Miami district under the reforestation bill

Whereas the Congress of the United States has passed a bill providing for a national forestry program which calls for the planting of new timber, the making of fire breaks, and the construction of trails and highways throughout the numerous forests of the Nation; and

Whereas the President of the United States has been pleased to sanction such a program with a view of assisting in the relief of the unemployment that exists at this time and with this new project being placed under the direction of the National Forest Service; and

Whereas there are at the present time over 2,500 people in destitute circumstances in the Miami district alone who are compelled to exist upon the meager aid furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and

Whereas in the Globe-Miami district there is a market for from fifty to a hundred million feet of lumber each year and as most of this lumber must be transported hundreds of miles before reaching this community we feel that the reforestation of our forests close at hand will prove a most profitable and worth-while feature; and

Whereas the reforestation of the forests near this locality will be of inestimable benefit to the watersheds of both the Roosevelt and the Coolidge Dams by eliminating the cause of erosion, by providing a better range condition for the cattle, and by slowing up of the disastrous result of excessive run-off from the melting snows in the spring and heavy rains in the summer: Therefore be it

Resolved by the mayor and the Common Council of the Town of Miami, That while we welcome and appreciate the importing of men from the East for this reforestation work, we still feel that the families in this district who are in dire distress should be given an opportunity for employment in this great national program. We feel that the planting of new timber on the slopes of the Pinal Mountains and in the Crook National Forest is quite essential in preventing the damage done each year to the property owners in this locality caused by the rushing of the drainage water from the steep slopes of the mountain sides during the rainy season in the summer months.

It is possible to place in the Crook National Forest two or more camps of 1,000 men each, who can be rotated with other men and in this way relieve the stagnant business condition of the district and shed a ray of sunshine as well as financial aid to the great number of unfortunate families who are in the most urgent need of immediate financial assistance; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the town of Miami be instructed to send a copy of this resolution by telegraph to Senator CARL HAYDEN and Senator HENRY ASHURST at Washington, D.C., calling their attention to our unemployment situation and have them get behind this excellent movement and seek immediate aid and relief for the thousands of citizens who are now reduced to a state of excessive poverty by conditions over which they had no control.

Passed and adopted this 6th day of April A.D. 1933.

Approved.

ARTHUR TURNER, Mayor.

Attested:

OREN F. FRARY, Town Clerk.

STATE OF ARIZONA, ss:

I, Oren Frary, clerk of the town of Miami, hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the original resolution which was passed and adopted by the town of Miami on the 6th day of April 1933 at a regular meeting held in the town hall in the town of Miami, Gila County, State of Arizona.

OREN F. FRARY, Town Clerk.

DEVELOPMENT OF CHRISTIAN FAMILY IDEALS

Mr. SHEPPARD (by request) submitted the following concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 3), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the United States of America is confronted with the conditions that have disturbed all of the nations of the world; and

Whereas it is manifest that these national disturbances in the fields of social, industrial, political, and religious life have been produced through failure to maintain family solidarity and caused a loss of the balance between the spiritual and material elements of national life; and

Whereas the alarming increase in the disturbance of domestic relationships and the increase of juvenile delinquency, as shown by court records, are signs of the ravages being worked to destroy the family, the unit that incorporates the basic elements of national integrity; and

Whereas statesmanship must concern itself for the perpetuation of the state by building a future citizenship in the strength of morality, and is warranted to draw upon every spiritual resource to achieve this end, for, as Washington said in his Farewell Address: "Both reason and experience forbid us to believe that the Nation's morality can continue after the exclusion of religious principles"; and

Whereas experience—the history of humanity—has demonstrated that a Republic like ours is strong and a blessing to its people and the world according to the moral character and intelligent religion of the people, for the strength and efficiency of any government by the people is in the character of the intelligence and morals of its citizens, inseparable from their religion, no non-Christian nation having ever retained its civil liberties; and

Whereas in this two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the first President of our United States of America it is the purpose of the National Government to honor his service to his country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That this Congress hereby appeals to the citizenship of the United States of America who are parents, pastors, and teachers, that they address themselves to serious and sustained effort to integrate within the family life of the Nation those ideals of spirituality represented by the simple virtues of the homely and humble life lived in the fear of God, that there be restored through the cooperation of those institutions growing out of the family—the home, the church, and the state—the balance between the spiritual and material, and that the remedy for these prevailing deteriorating conditions of society be effected through the inculcation in our growing youth of spirituality, morality, and good conscience toward the God of our Nation.

That it is the judgment of the Congress of the United States of America that only upon the lines herein suggested can there be the perpetuation of the home, the protection of the church, and the preservation of the state. In achieving these great ends it shall mean the crime checked, social conditions corrected, economic security maintained, industrial concord established, the future of the state assured, the conservation of our youth for future citizenship provided, and our Nation preserved for that destiny intended for it by the Almighty God.

AMENDMENT OF EMERGENCY RELIEF AND CONSTRUCTION ACT

Mr. SCHALL and Mr. SHEPPARD each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 509) to amend the emergency relief and construction act of 1932, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PERSONNEL OF THE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I present for the information of Members of Congress a statement of the Independent Legislative Bureau, Richard W. Hogue, director, entitled "Reorganization or Disorganization."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

REORGANIZATION OR DISORGANIZATION

This statement is issued in no spirit of political partisanship or class selfishness. It is motivated by a deep concern for the public interest and the good of the Government in the crisis that confronts our country and its people.

The efficiency of the Federal Government and its capacity to protect and to serve the public depend largely upon the large body of trained men in its scientific and professional departments. Practically all of these scientific workers entered the service in normal or prosperous times, many at lower salaries than were available in business and industry. They were selected after competitive examination and have given years of devoted, competent, and often significant service. They have contributed to the stability of the Government, the protection of the public, the progress of knowledge, and the material welfare of the Nation.

For their security, the protection of their work, and the good of the Government, Congress created the safeguard of the Civil Service. A serious depletion of their numbers or a drastic curtailment of their important activities at this time would be a costly experiment, wholly aside from the question of justice and fair dealing. It would not only be a blow to civil service and a contribution to prevailing unemployment but would inject a new element of competition in the overcrowded field of private employment and add another factor to help prolong the process of deflation.

The mere tightening of the purse strings of the Federal Treasury is not necessarily an act of wisdom or sound economy. There is a point at which retrenchment becomes a menace to life, with governments no less than with persons. To threaten the security and weaken the morale of the civil service at a time of such widespread insecurity and distress is fraught with manifold harm. Has the Government no moral obligation to preserve the sanctity of an implied contract with its civil-service employees, who logically assumed permanency of position when they entered the service?

A balanced Budget becomes a meaningless exhibit when produced by cutting down essential activities and discouraging public service.

There is a point at which reorganization becomes disorganization. A "pennywise and pound-foolish" policy is possible with governments as with people and is infinitely more far-reaching in its evil effects.

REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON COAST EROSION, ETC.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, owing to the fact that we are indulging in some reforestation at the present time, it may be of interest to those people who are directing it to read, or at least have access to, a report of the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion and Afforestation issued in 1909. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have this report inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

I. Royal warrant of March 1908 increasing the scope of the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion and the Reclamation of Tidal Lands.

II. Synopsis of principal conclusions of the Royal Commission on coast erosion and afforestation.

III. Summary of principal conclusions and recommendations of the Royal Commission on coast erosion and afforestation.

IV. Outline of the arrangement of the Royal Commission report on afforestation.

ROYAL WARRANT OF MARCH 1908 INCREASING THE SCOPE OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON COAST EROSION AND THE RECLAMATION OF TIDAL LANDS

1. By royal warrant of July 1906 the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion and the Reclamation of Tidal Lands was created.

2. By royal warrant of March 1908 the scope of this commission was increased by directing it to inquire and report:

"Whether in connection with reclaimed lands or otherwise, it is desirable to make an experiment in afforestation as a means of increasing employment during periods of depression in the labor market, and if so by what authority and under what conditions such experiment should be conducted."[1]

SYNOPSIS OF PRINCIPAL CONCLUSIONS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON COAST EROSION AND AFFORESTATION[2]

The following is a synopsis of the principal conclusions reached in this report:

1. Afforestation is practicable and desirable.

2. Approximate available area in the United Kingdom without material encroachment upon agricultural land is 9,000,000 acres.

3. Best rotation to secure sustained timber yield requires 150,000 acres to be afforested annually.

4. Employment:

(a) Temporary.—Temporary employment is afforded annually to 18,000 men during the winter months. Further, an almost equal number would indirectly derive employment in the incidental and subsidiary occupations connected with forestry. This figure might be increased in any year to meet exceptional pressure of unemployment.

(b) Permanent.—Permanent employment is afforded to 1 man per 100 acres afforested, rising to 90,000 men when the whole area has been dealt with.

(c) Ultimate.—The employment connected with subsidiary industries—that is, conversion and manipulation, etc., of the timber crop—would afford occupation for a still larger population.

5. Any scheme of national afforestation should be on an economic basis.

6. Labor.—There are sufficient unemployed persons willing to submit to, and able to satisfy, ordinary labor tests, who could advantageously be employed without a period of special training.

7. Finance.—Afforestation represents a productive investment and should be financed by a loan. The annual sum required for the full scheme is £2,000,000. The interest on the loan should be defrayed out of taxation. The net deficit will be £90,000 in the first year and will rise progressively to £3,131,250 in the fortieth year, after which period the forest becomes more than self-supporting.

8. Profits.—After 80 years the net revenue from the forest, at present prices—which promise to be materially enhanced—should be 17½ millions. This represents 3¾ percent on the net cost calculated at accumulated compound interest of 3 percent. Looked at from another point of view, the state will then be in possession of property worth £562,000,000, or about £107,000,000 in excess of the total cost involved in its creation, calculated at 3 percent compound interest.

9. Administration and control.—The afforestation scheme to be entrusted to a special board of commissioners. In default of purchase by agreement, land to be acquired, if necessary, under compulsory powers.

10. Disturbance.—The acquisition of grazing areas for silviculture might necessitate a modification of the existing agricultural system on certain farms. There is no reason to suppose that the remaining lowland areas on such farms could not either be adapted to other forms of agriculture or could not, in many cases, be profitably utilized for small holdings. The acquisition of grazing areas, private or common, should present no difficulty which cannot be satisfied by arbitration and reasonable compensation.

11. Incidental.—Afforestation creates a new industry; it does not compete with private enterprise. The conversion of comparatively unprofitable lands into forests enhances the productiveness of the adjacent areas and should promote the development of the smallholdings movement. More than any other apparent remedy, afforestation will stem the tide of rural depopulation.[3]

PART VI OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT ON AFFORESTATION—SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

106. Coming now to the summary of the conclusions and recommendations to which the evidence points, your commissioners find that—

(1) The natural conditions of soil and climate in the United Kingdom are favorable to the production of high-class commercial timber such as is annually imported into the country in very great quantities.

(2) The afforestation of suitable lands in the United Kingdom, if undertaken on an adequate scale and in accordance with well-recognized scientific principles, should prove at present prices a sound and remunerative investment.

(3) In estimating the profits of silviculture, account, must, moreover, be taken of two facts: The increasing consumption of timber per head of population all over the world, in spite of the introduction of alternative materials; and, further, the exploitation, waste, and destruction by fire of the virgin forests, especially those yielding the more important building timbers. Already a noticeable shortage of timber supply has resulted, as is evidenced by steadily rising prices and depreciating qualities in all markets. It seems impossible to escape from the conclusion that this tendency will be continued and accentuated, and that a steady and a very considerable rise in prices may be looked for throughout the present century. The security which afforestation offers for investment is, therefore, likely to be an improving one, with a corresponding increase in profits, but to avoid all that is speculative this prospect has been disregarded in framing our estimates.

(4) The amount of land suitable for afforestation but not now under timber in the United Kingdom may roughly be put at a maximum of 9,000,000 acres. In determining this figure two considerations have been taken into account, besides elevation and physical suitability of soil. The first is that the value of the land is not in excess of a sum on which a fair return may be anticipated on the expenditure. This will naturally vary according to the productive capacity of the soil and the crop which it will carry. The second consideration is that the land could not be more profitably utilized in any other way.

(5) A forest of 9,000,000 acres, in which are represented the various series of age classes, may be expected to yield 9,000,000 loads annually in perpetuity. The importation of foreign timber from temperate climates into the United Kingdom in the year 1907 exceeded 8,500,000 loads, or approximately the annual supply which could be expected from the afforestation of the above-mentioned area.

(6) The withdrawal of 9,000,000 acres from its present uses would cause some gradual curtailment of food supplies and displacement of labor. Land suitable for afforestation is mostly devoted to the production of mutton. Calculations on the basis of the present consumption show that at most 60,000 tons, or 4.8 percent of the total home production of meat, or 2.6 percent of the present national consumption, would be ultimately displaced. As to labor, the employment furnished by the present uses, mostly sheep farming, to which the land in question is devoted, may be taken to average 1 man to 1,000 acres. This does not represent one tenth of the permanent employment afforded by the maintenance of a similar area of land under forest.

(7) Systematic silviculture aims at the production of a steady and continuous supply of marketable timber. To insure the maintenance of these supplies the area should be divided for planting by the average number of years which the crop needs to mature; for example, if the life of the crop be taken as 80 years, the area to be afforested every year would, out of a total area of 9,000,000 acres, be 112,500 acres. But a more rapid system of planting may be adopted without seriously complicating the rotation, and further, some adaptation to the temporary fluctuations of the labor market is feasible.

[3] Ibid., p. x. This second report of the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion and Afforestation may be more briefly cited as Command Paper 4460, vol. II, pt. I.

(8) The distribution of this 9,000,000 acres of suitable land is somewhat irregular. By far the largest areas are to be met with in the west and north of England, and throughout similar regions in Scotland. Ireland and Wales also contain a relatively large amount of this type of land. In the south and east of England, on the other hand, the areas in the aggregate are less extensive. Great diversity exists in the size of these areas, some counties offering large contiguous stretches, while in others the areas are characterized by their discontinuous nature.

(9) The administration of national forest lands should be entrusted to special commissioners.

(10) In dealing with these lands, subdivision into distinct districts, with an executive and administrative subcenter, commends itself from various points of view. Thus local employment would be afforded, local subsidiary industries would be encouraged, public recreation grounds would be provided, and, in connection with the establishment of such forests, small holdings would undoubtedly be multiplied.

(11) Silviculture in the United Kingdom is an enterprise which rarely appeals to the private landowner or capitalist. The prolonged time for which capital must be locked up before any return can be expected, the loss of rent and burden of rates over the whole period, and the absence of security for continuous care and management, act as deterrents. None of these objections applies to the state whose corporate life and resources lend themselves in an especial degree to an undertaking of this character. If the state plants, it will certainly reap, which the individual owner can rarely hope to do.

(12) If afforestation be promoted on a large scale, the provision of suitable lands is the first step. For this purpose a general survey should be made, and the extent and distribution of such lands ascertained. As a rule, it will be found expedient for the state to purchase from time to time such areas as are destined for planting, but some progress may conceivably be made along the lines of profit-sharing, in which case the owner would forego the purchase price. Experience proves that, although much of the land required may be expected to be purchasable by voluntary treaty, yet compulsory powers would be necessary to facilitate transactions where voluntary treaty had broken down. The principle laid down in the Small Holdings Act of 1907 for the acquisition of lands should govern these proceedings, as to arbitration, restrictions, and safeguards. Where private owners can satisfy the forest commissioners that they are able and willing to afforest, under their supervision and to their satisfaction, and give an undertaking to that effect, compulsory powers should not be enforced against such owners so long as that undertaking is fulfilled.

(13) The value of land falling within the definition of "suitability" may be taken, except in rare instances, to lie between £2 and £10 freehold value; but the average value of suitable lands, including the necessary buildings and other preliminary equipment, may be taken as £6 10s. per acre, and the average cost of afforestation also at £6 10s. per acre. If 150,000 acres be annually taken in hand, a sum of about £2,000,000 would be needed annually to finance the undertaking.

(14) Money expended in afforestation differs in kind from other calls on the national purse. It is a productive investment of capital. To provide this capital sum out of taxes would be an act of unprecedented generosity on the part of the present generation of taxpayers in favor of their posterity. No stronger justification for proceeding by loan than a reproductive outlay exists. The loan should be based on actuarial calculations showing initial cost, expenses of upkeep and management calculated at compound interest over the whole period, and the value of the property when fully matured. Such actuarial statements we have given, which show, for the full scheme, that, after allowing 3 percent compound interest on all the capital invested, the approximate equalized revenue would at the end of 80 years amount to £17,411,000 per annum, while the value of the property might be expected to be £562,075,900, or £106,993,000 in excess of the sum involved in its creation. A smaller scheme involving the afforestation of 6,000,000 acres (75,000 acres annually for 80 years) would show a profit of about £10,000,000 annually, or a capital value of £320,000,000, being £60,944,000 in excess of the cost of production.

(15) Coming to ways and means by which a loan of this character may best be provided, a point of great importance to be borne in mind is that although the period of rotation of a timber crop may be taken as 80 years, yet after 40 years, owing to the value of thinnings and the receipts of some short-period crops, the forest becomes practically self-supporting. Between the fortieth and eightieth years the sales of timber will be sufficient to meet the annual charges, including the upkeep and the extension of the forest. After the eightieth year a large annual revenue will be derived. These considerations point to a free loan from the treasury to the forest commissioners; the net deficit to be met would in the first year be £90,000 or £45,000, according to the extent of the operation, and would reach its maximum in the fortieth year, amounting in that year to £3,131,250 or £1,565,625. After this period the deficit would be insignificant, while in the eighty-first year the revenue derived would be £17,411,000 or £10,000,000, respectively, representing about 3¾ percent on the total accumulated costs of the undertaking.

nomic lines. They have no hesitation in asserting that there are in the United Kingdom at any time, and especially in winter, thousands of men out of work for longer or shorter periods who are quite ready and able to perform the less skilled work without previous training and with satisfactory results. There is a still larger class of unemployed, who are capable of being trained to perform this or the higher class of labor, and such men can, if desired, be recruited through labor colonies, distress committees, labor bureaus, or charitable agencies. There is, then, no need to accept inefficient labor with the object of affording occupation tc the unemployed. The labor employed in the national forests should not fall below the ordinary standards, and should be remunerated at the ordinary rate of the district for similar labor. Subject to the requisite standard of efficiency being attained, preference should be given to those temporarily or permanently unemployed in the district, especially where evidence of such efficiency can be furnished by public or private agencies for the reclamation and training of the unemployed class.

(17) To establish afforestation on commercial lines does not, however, preclude its being used as an instrument of social regeneration. A broad view of economics cannot exclude from its cognizance the grave national charge which unemployment with all its concomitant results involves, to say nothing of the personal deterioration by which it is often accompanied. Silviculture is not unsuitable for building up the moral and physical fiber of even the most depressed of the unemployed classes, and its agency may well be invoked for this purpose, and advantage taken of its healthy and wholesome influences, provided that any additional expense incurred by the employment of less efficient labor be defrayed from a separate account.

(18) In estimating the amount of employment furnished by afforestation it is well to distinguish between the temporary labor involved in the creation of the forest and the permanent labor needed for its maintenance. Taking varying circumstances into consideration, it may be said that, on the average, it will take 12 men to afforest 100 acres in the planting season of 4 to 5 months, and that every 100 acres afforested will provide permanent employment for at least 1 man. If 150,000 acres be annually taken in hand, the labor of 18,000 men will be needed and permanent employment will in due course be afforded to 1,500 men, rising by an additional 1,500 every year until the end of the rotation. The number permanently employed would then approach 100,000. The labor absorbed by felling and converting timber, to say nothing of subsidiary industries which spring up around a timber supply, has been considered too remote to warrant detailed estimation, but there is undoubtedly a large field of employment in this connection. It is important to remember that, on the basis of £1,000,000 being annually spent on the operations of afforestation, apart from the cost of the land, employment would be afforded, directly and indirectly, to many more than 18,000 men. Indeed, the number employed may be roughly taken to be represented by about double that figure. For the incidental occupations, such as building, the making of implements, the provision of materials, etc., all involve the employment of additional labor.

(19) A special advantage of forestry in relation to labor is that it offers a new source of employment. The labor connected with timber and timber products imported into the country is performed abroad, and thousands of families are maintained on the produce of the labor associated with the timber industry. Another advantage bound up with the extensions of silviculture is that the market for its produce is so great that it is inconceivable that it could seriously interfere with the output from private woodlands, and no difficulty of competition between the State and individuals need be apprehended.

(20) The acquisition of grazing areas, private or common, for silviculture might necessitate a modification of the existing agricultural system on certain farms. It is unreasonable to suppose that the remaining lowland areas on such farms could not, in many cases, either be adapted to other forms of agriculture or be profitably utilized for small holdings. Further, the conversion of comparatively unprofitable lands into forests enhances the productiveness of the adjacent areas, and should materially assist the small-holdings movement. It has also the advantage of furnishing winter employment to small holders.

107. In view of the foregoing conclusions, your commissioners recommend that—

1. Parliamentary powers be obtained to: (a) Appoint commissioners charged with the duty of carrying out a national scheme of afforestation; (b) vest in them power to survey and determine what land falls under a statutory definition of "suitability", and to acquire such land as from time to time may be required for afforestation or purposes incidental thereto; (c) equip the commissioners with compulsory powers for the acquisition of such land on the precedent of the Small Holdings Act, 1907, so far as applicable, subject to the reservation of certain rights to private owners; (d) authorize the treasury to grant the commissioners an annual free loan for the necessary period.

2. (a) The commissioners should prepare a general scheme of afforestation for the whole of the contemplated area extending over the entire period of rotation; (b) an actuarial statement should be supplied by them to the treasury indicating when and in what manner the loan and interest would be repaid; (c) the afforestable area should be divided into convenient subdistricts; (d) work should be commenced in each, or as many as convenient, of the districts in such a way as to provide that the earlier operations, which may be regarded as experimental, should be capable of determination or of forming part of the complete forest scheme for eash district.[4]

OUTLINE OF THE ARRANGEMENT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT ON AFFORESTATION

Part I examines the present position of British woodlands, shows that natural conditions in the United Kingdom are favorable to the growth of trees at a profit, and points out that, owing to the present scarcity of timber and the probable rise in prices, the prospects of afforestation are very encouraging.

Part II examines the question of unemployed labor in its relation to afforestation and considers the limits within which such labor can be profitably utilized. This part also deals with the question of the amount of labor which, permanently or temporarily, can be absorbed by afforestation, and incidentally refers to the effect which afforestation will probably have upon agriculture, rural depopulation, and the food suplies of the nation.

Part III deals with the question of the nature and the extent of the land suitable for afforestation in the United Kingdom.

Part IV refers to the proposal for a national scheme of afforestation, and deals with the question of the authority which should administer such a scheme and the measures which seem to be requisite for the acquisition of the necessary land.

Part V deals with the finance of the subject and includes financial estimates showing the detailed working of two schemes of planting, based on certain assumptions, and also the results, from a financial standpoint, which may be anticipated in connection with these schemes.

Part VI is a summary of the principal conclusions and recommendations.[5]

PALESTINE FOR THE JEWS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech by Hon. Walter M. Chandler, of New York, in the House of Representatives, Friday, June 30, 1922, on the subject of "Palestine for the Jews."

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS OF HON. WALTER M. CHANDLER, OF NEW YORK, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 30, 1922

"The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave, Mankind their country—Israel but the grave!"
—Lord Byron.

Mr. Speaker, as an introduction to my speech I desire to read House Joint Resolution 322:

"Joint resolution favoring the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people

"Whereas the Jewish people have for many centuries believed in and yearned for the rebuilding of their ancient homeland; and

"Whereas, owing to the outcome of the World War and their part therein, the Jewish people are to be enabled to re-create and reorganize a national home in the land of their fathers, which will give to the House of Israel its long-denied opportunity to reestablish a fruitful Jewish life and culture in the ancient Jewish land: Therefore be it

"Resolved, etc., That the United States of America favors the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of Christian and all other non-Jewish communities in Palestine, and that the holy places and religious buildings and sites in Palestine shall be adequately protected."

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the pending resolution and shall vote for its passage because it embodies the highest and noblest ideals of liberty, humanity, and civilization.

It is a similar resolution to the one already unanimously passed by the United States Senate, and congressional action in this matter is entirely consonant with the spirit of our free institutions and with our oft-repeated official proclamations of national sympathy with the hopes and aspirations of struggling races for freedom and independence.

This resolution does not propose to involve our country in any foreign entanglements or to bind us by any financial obligations whatsoever. It simply expresses our sympathy, as the representatives of a free people, with the national desires and aspirations for a homeland in Palestine of a scattered and persecuted race, whose contributions to the intellectual and spiritual wealth of the world have been unequaled by those of any other people.

Our sense of justice and our sentiment of freedom alike should dictate the immediate passage of this resolution. National gratitude also demands its passage, for our country, like every other civilized nation on the globe, is under a heavy debt of gratitude to the Jews for their marvelous contributions to the uplift of mankind and to the civilization of the earth.

Aside from the lofty inspiration and the rich heritage of Jewish genius in history, of which we are the direct beneficiaries along with all the other races of mankind, Jewish sacred influences confront and surround each and all of us at all times and in all places—at the prayer meeting, in the Sunday school, in the church, in the cathedral, and in the synagogue.

When the Chaplain offers prayer at each day's opening of this House, he invokes upon its Members the benedictions of a Hebrew God and the intercessions of a Hebrew Savior.

The three great events of man's existence are said to be birth, marriage, and death. The spiritual food, solace, and inspiration of each of these great events are furnished by the Jew. The hallowing influence of Hebrew scriptures is invoked when infancy is christened into religious life. Jewish music, Mendelssohn's Wedding March, furnishes the entrancing accompaniment when bride and bridegroom meet at the marriage altar to pledge eternal love and to be bound to the duties of wedded life by the obligations of Hebrew sacred law. And, lastly, at every open grave in Christendom is read the funeral sermon of St. Paul, a Jew. Thus the Jew goes with us from the cradle to the grave as our spiritual guide and savior. I respectfully submit that every sentiment of decent gratitude should prompt us to help him when we can, and never to persecute him.

The gratitude that should prompt the adoption of this resolution is born not merely of the priceless legacy of spiritual hope, consolation, and assurance that he has bequeathed to us through the centuries. It springs, too, from the contributions of the Jew to the liberties of the human race in every land and time, for the Jew has been the child of revolution and the friend of freedom in every age.

The Mosaic commonwealth was theocratic in origin and character but democratic in function and effect. All the prophets of Israel were fearless champions of human rights. Isaiah and Jeremiah were the first great revolutionists of earth.

Not only have the Jews been friends of freedom in every age; the friends of freedom of every age—Montesquieu and Mirabeau, Cromwell and Macaulay, Cavour and Mazzini, and Washington—have been friends of the Jews. What more fitting tribute, then, could be paid, what finer, what more appropriate expression of appreciation could be offered by the Representatives of a free Nation than to vote this resolution of sympathy and encouragement to the people of a race that has always, in Senate and in Parliament and upon the battlefield, been found foremost among the champions of human freedom and of human rights?

The project of founding a new Jewish commonwealth in Palestine is familiar to all readers of the daily press. The so-called "Zionist movement" has many ardent advocates and able supporters among Jews and Gentiles throughout the earth. The overwhelming majority of the Jews of America, from all that I can learn, are enthusiastically in favor of it.

The great world struggle has given a powerful impetus to the movement. Besides, the national idea and the religious self-consciousness of the Hebrew race in all ages have been seeds awaiting ripening for such an event. It has been truly said that—

"Since the destruction of the second temple by Titus, since the dispersion of the Jews throughout the world, this ancient people has not ceased to long fervently for a return to the lost land of their fathers nor to entertain for it a determined hope."

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem,
Let my right hand forget her cunning.
Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth,
If I remember thee not;
If I prefer not Jerusalem
Above my chief joy." (Psalm, cxxxvii:5–6.)

This plaintive and pathetic song was chanted in Babylonian exile more than 2,000 years ago, and it finds today a sacred echo in the heart yearnings of every Zionist in the world.

To high patriotic purposes and to deep-seated race feelings and impulses is added the religious belief of millions of orthodox Jews that the time has come for the fulfillment of divine prophecy and promise in the gathering of the children of Israel again into the ancient homeland. The foundation of this prophecy is found in Deuteronomy, xxx:

"If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will He fetch thee: And the Lord thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and He will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers."

And in Amos, ix:14–15:

"And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them.

"And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord, thy God."

Patriotic pride, race impulse, and religious faith, fed and sustained by ancient prophecy and promise, are undoubtedly the great mainsprings of motive of the Zionist movement. Subsidiary and contributory to all these things is without question the cumulative effect of Jewish persecution of every age from the ancient Egyptians to the anti-Semites and Jew baiters of modern times.

Mr. Speaker, in all the history of prejudice the persecution of the Jew has no parallel. Whether born of human wickedness or divine vengeance, Jewish persecution is the strangest of all historical phenomena. When and where it originated and what have been its intensifying and perpetuating causes are still subjects of grave doubt and speculative debate. In any case it represents one of the blackest phases of human life, for it invariably involves all the elements of ignorance and bigotry, of cowardice and cruelty. I never hear any man engaging in wholesale slander of the Jewish race that I do not say to myself: You are either an ignoramus, a bigot, a coward, or all combined in one. Moreover, you are an ingrate of the meanest type, for you are the direct heir and beneficiary of all that the Jew has ever said or done to elevate and save mankind.

To describe the horrors and cruelties of Jewish persecution would be to narrate the history of the Jewish race during 2,000 years. Time does not permit and the occasion does not demand such a narrative. I will only quote in this connection Rabbi Ben Ezra's Song of Death, which gives pathetic utterance to the agonizing cry of his people of all ages to the God of their fathers for protection and relief:

"By the torture prolonged from age to age,
By the infamy, Israel's heritage,
By the ghetto's plague, by the garb's disgrace,
By the badge of shame, by the felon's place,
By the branding tool, the bloody whip,
And the summons to Christian fellowship."

In this poetic plaint are crowded the cruel memories of a thousand years of Jewish persecution.

But only yesterday in private conversation with a Member of this House, himself a Jew, while discussing this resolution, I was told that the days of Jewish persecution had practically passed forever, that the age of freedom and enlightenment was at hand, and that Jewish persecution was no longer a valid motive, a rational excuse, for the Zionist movement. I was astonished to hear him say this.

It is a truth well known to all intelligent men that racial prejudice against the Jew has not completely vanished from the minds and hearts of gentiles; that political freedom in an enlightened age has not brought with it full religious tolerance and social recognition; that the Jew enjoys the freedom of the letter, but is still under the ban of the spirit. It is not necessary to go to Russia or Rumania to prove this contention.

In 1896 Adolph von Sonnenthal, the greatest of modern actors, who covered the Austrian stage with glory, celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his entrance into threatrical life. The city council of Vienna refused to extend him the freedom of the city because he was a Jew.

In 1906 Madame Bernhardt, the most marvelous living woman, while acting in Canada, was insulted by having spoiled eggs thrown upon the stage amidst shouts of "Down with the Jewess!" This outrage called forth a letter of apology, which appeared in public print, from Sir Wilfred Laurier, Prime Minister of the Dominion.

In the summer of 1907 the sister of Senator Isidor Rayner, of Maryland, was refused admission to an Atlantic City hotel because she was a Jewess. Be it remembered that these several acts of prejudice and persecution did not happen in the middle ages or under the government of the Romanoffs. Two of them occurred at the beginning of the twentieth century, beneath the flags of two of the freest and most civilized nations of the globe. What have Americans to say of the exclusion of a virtuous, refined, intelligent sister of a great American Senator from an American hotel for no other reason than that she was a Jewess; that is, that she was of the same race with the Savior of mankind?

What have you to say, my colleagues, of the Leonard Kaplan incident at Annapolis, an occurrence of the last 4 weeks? Does this tend to show that the age of enlightenment and freedom is here and that Jewish persecution has ceased? The severe reprimand of the Government administered to the Christian midshipman for "cruelty"—to use a word of Mr. Roosevelt—to his Jewish classmate and comrade was a fitting and necessary rebuke, but it did not and will not cure Jewish persecution, for the very week following the Kaplan incident we learned from the public press that Harvard University, one of our greatest and oldest schools of learning, was to limit Jews among its students.

These considerations, among others, lead me to lend enthusiastic support to the passage of the pending resolution, for I want the Congress of the United States, of which I have the honor to be a Member, to express its sympathy with Jewish hopes and aspirations, register its approval of Jewish national rights, and condemn, indirectly at least, the spirit of bigotry and race prejudice, which gives the lie to the bill of rights in our Constitution and brands with hypocrisy our national professions of equality of citizenship in America.

If ungenerous and un-American impulses and fierce and unbridled passions must kindle the fires and stir the hatreds of religious bigotry among the people at large, let us here at least, in the sacred confines of this Hall, preserve a dignified and patriotic equanimity, a statesmanlike composure, and a courageous attitude as the legislative guardians of civil and religious freedom on this continent. Let us, above all things, not forget that this Republic was not designed by the Revolutionary fathers to be Protestant, Catholic, or Jewish, but was intended as a perpetual asylum of religious freedom, where Protestant, Catholic, and Jew might each worship Almighty God after the dictates of his own conscience and in his own way.

To say the least of it, if we are to continue to persecute the Jew we should as a matter of simple justice be willing to aid him in the establishment of a homeland beyond the seas where he can be free from persecution. There is all the greater truth in this, since we are practically shutting out from our shores by unreasonable rigid and discriminating immigration laws struggling and persecuted Jews, the majority of whom would be a benefit rather than a hurt to our citizenship and our country.

In a speech delivered by me in this House on April 20, 1921, in opposition to the immigration bill of that year, I used the following language with reference to Jewish immigrants to our shores:

"I note numerous exceptions to the general provisions of this bill, and I unhesitatingly declare to you, my colleagues, that if I had the framing of the measure for final passage I would make a distinct exception of the Jews. I would do it upon no ground of sentiment or whim. I would base the exception upon righteousness and eternal justice. In the framing of the bill and the enactment of the law I would boldly declare to America and to the world that the Jews are a distinct race, with a distinct history, presenting a distinct and irresistible appeal to the judgment and conscience and mercy of mankind. I would declare them to be a scattered race, with no willing and capable protectors against persecution and oppression. I would call the attention of the people of the earth to what they already know, that the Jews gave to Christianity its Savior, to mankind its noblest religion, and to civilization much that is grandest and most beautiful in literature, music, and art. These considerations I would make the basis of an exception to the general provisions of this bill—that all Jews, from whatever parts of the earth they came, who satisfied the requirements of the general immigration laws regarding tests of health, sanity, morals, and good citizenship, should be admitted. An exception of this kind would be in keeping with our national traditions of refuge and asylum for the downtrodden of the earth, and would be a fitting acknowledgment of our indebtedness to the authors and finishers of our religious faith, whose code of morals lies deep at the foundation of all our secular laws, State and national.

I wish to repeat and emphasize in this speech what I said in that one. I shall probably go a step farther when the next immigration bill is offered in this House. I shall probably propose an amendment embodying the principles and providing for the privileges for the Jews that I merely suggested in my speech of April 20, 1921. If I accomplish nothing more, I shall at least test the sentiments and feelings of the Members of this body in relation to the Jews and Jewish immigration.

Is there doubt and has there been discussion, you may ask, concerning these sentiments and feelings? Yes, indeed; more than once in the deliberations of committees and in the debates on the floor of this House concerning Jews and Jewish immigration. The question arose at the hearings before the Foreign Affairs Committee on this resolution before us in a colloquy between Mr. Smith of Michigan, a member of the committee, and Mr. Abraham Goldberg, of New York City, representing the Zionists of America. Mr. Goldberg seemed not willing to declare that our present immigration laws were aimed at the Jews, but merely contented himself with asserting that the Jews were of all races most severely affected by them. Mr. Goldberg, being a Jew, doubtless felt a certain delicacy and timidity in expressing his real sentiments on the subject. Being a Gentile Congressman, I have no such feelings of delicacy and timidity, and I declare to you that it is my sincere conviction that a desire to exclude both Jews and Catholics from our shores has been one of the most potent influences in modern American immigration legislation.

I declared this conviction in a speech against the Burnett immigration bill that I delivered on the floor of this House on March 25, 1916. In that speech I elaborated arguments in favor of my contention and was supported in the debate by ex-Representative William S. Bennet, of New York, and by my distinguished colleague, Mr. Gallivan, of Massachusetts, who still is an honored Member of this body.

At the hearings of January 20, 1916, before the Immigration Committee, Miss Grace Abbott, of Chicago, a Protestant lady of fine character and extensive experience in immigrant affairs, who is at the present time the efficient head of the Women's Bureau, gave expression to the following deeply significant sentiment:

"I think many people oppose the recent immigration because it is Catholic and Jewish instead of Protestant, as the earlier was. I am neither Catholic nor Jewish."

This declaration was born of the experience and observations of many years of devoted service spent in helping immigrants, and Miss Abbott knew full well whereof she spoke.

But why devote so much time, you may ask, to discussing the immigration question in its relation to the pending resolution providing for a homeland in Palestine for the Jews? The reason is that if we are to shut the Jew from our gates by stringent immigration laws, we should at least be willing to do what we can to aid him in the establishment of a country of his own where he can live in peace and happiness. The plainest dictates of humanity suggest and demand it.

A year and a half ago I traveled extensively in Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Russia, and Lithuania. I studied the Jewish question at first hand, especially in Poland. I was amazed and shocked at what I saw and heard. Persecution, poverty, misery, disease, death, and destruction confront the Jew everywhere in southeastern Europe. He is at times hunted like a wild beast, for no other reason than that he is a Jew, and there is no boundary of territory that he can cross for refuge and asylum. He is brutally and cruelly chased by one band of pursuers only to be even more brutally and cruelly thrown back by another. And supposedly free America, with continental expanse of territory, with boundless natural resources, with the Mississippi Valley that, if intensively cultivated, would feed the human race for a thousand years, with the Goddess of Liberty in the harbor of New York brandishing forever a torch of freedom and of welcome to the oppressed and distressed of all mankind, and with professions of faith in Jesus, the Jew of Nazareth, forever upon our lips, this supposedly free America is willing to adopt and execute rigidly a 3-percent immigration law that practically shuts these wretched beings from the hospitality of our shores and the shelter of our flag.

There are about 15,000,000 Jews in the world. There are about 3,000,000 Jews in the United States. There are about 12,000,000 Jews scattered over the earth outside the United States. Considering the appalling state of affairs in Europe and the prospects of an indefinite continuance, I declare to you in all sincerity, my colleagues, that if I had the power I would bind my country by definite obligations to aid substantially the Jews in establishing a permanent home in Palestine. I would then admit the remaining millions of Jews who could not find room in their ancient homelands to our shores to become citizens of this free Republic, to enjoy the benefits of its citizenship, and to render obedience to its institutions and its laws.

I would, of course, demand satisfactory answers to the following questions from each and all and every one of them: "Are you sound and healthy in body, mind, and morals? Do you believe in our Constitution and our laws, and will you loyally obey them? Do you love our flag, and will you patriotically follow and uphold and defend it at all times?"

Upon receiving satisfactory answers to these questions, I would say: "Children of Abraham, descendants of the descendants of the creators of monotheism, who consented that their country should be conquered, their nationality destroyed, and their race dispersed throughout the world in order that this best and noblest gift of God to man, monotheism, might not be sacrificed to pagan and barbarian superstition but might instead be transmitted as a heavenly heritage to all future generations of men, I welcome you to America and bid you be at home."

Mr. Speaker, the obstacles to this new plan of erecting an independent Jewish state in Palestine are many, but not insuperable. The British Government and her allies, under the Balfour declaration, propose to guarantee to the Jews the return of the territory of their ancient Jewish fatherland after the country has been sufficiently colonized by the Jews under the British mandate.

Palestine is about the size of the State of Vermont and has a present population of about 700,000 souls. There are about 15,000,000 Jews in the world. It is reasonably contended that one half of all the Jews of the earth could live in Palestine under methods of modern intensive farming and under the electrification and irrigation of the country through plans of harnessing the water power of the Jordan and Yarmuk Rivers, plans that have been submitted by the great Jewish engineer, Pincus Ruttenberg.

Palestine is about the size of Belgium, which has a population of 7,600,000. If the plans of Ruttenberg for the redemption of the barren and waste places of the country around Jerusalem, through electrification and irrigation, by utilizing the waters of the Jordan and the Yarmuk are successful, and there is no earthly reason to believe that these plans will not succeed, then Palestine should be able to sustain a population as large as that of Belgium.

A successful culmination of the Zionist movement would probably realize, in time, an emigration of 7,000,000 Jews from other lands, as the innate love of the average Jew for the cradleland of his race, coupled with glorious and thrilling memories of long ago, and the hard lot of misery and grinding toil now endured by many of them in different parts of the world, would be a powerful incentive to join the new settlements in the East. The tide of emigration is already beginning to flow strongly that way, and many flourishing Jewish colonies already exist in Palestine.

There is no reason from a physical viewpoint why Jerusalem and the surrounding country should not become the seat of a prosperous and successful state. The popular notion that Palestine is altogether a barren country, not capable of yielding rich harvests, is a mistaken one. Its appearance is barren only during the dry season, when the grasses which cover the greater part of it are dried up and the herdsmen retire with their flocks of sheep and goats to the loftier mountains. The alluvial lowland to the south of Mount Carmel is as fruitful as ever, and it only needs an honest and vigorous administration, under the plans for electrification and irrigation devised by Ruttenberg, to create in Palestine a land of intensive farming as well as a center of industrial activity. There is no reason why Palestine should not be to the eastern Mediterranean what Belgium is to the North Sea, a perfect beehive of industrial creation and commercial output.

An enlightened political management would not only rekindle the olden Jewish love of agriculture but would revive the ancient glories of Phœnician commerce through the ports of Acre and Jaffa, which would give an outlet to all the world.

All the spiritual and intellectual elements would certainly be present in the building and perpetuating of a new Jewish commonwealth in Palestine. The Bible and the Talmud would again be their religious guides and the charters of their freedom. A Maccabean soldiery would again defend their national frontiers. A Jerusalem parliament would be heard to echo the splendid eloquence of new Disraelis, Gambettas, and Castelars. Some new Josephus would record the growth of the expanding State, and the melodies of Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer would cheer and sanctify the domestic circles of happy Jewish homes. Such a commonwealth or republic is a consummation most devoutly to be wished if Jewish genius and civilization are to be lost, as is now feared, in some great maelstrom of war and in the readjustment of the boundaries of States and the realignment of races.

Why should not the nations of the world join in such an enterprise if the Jews desire it? Every kindgom of the earth has tried its hand at exterminating them and has failed. Why should they not now change the program for a while and extend to the patriarch of the tribes, the old man of the centuries, a kindly and helping hand? England will turn Palestine over to the Jewish people at the proper time. Can we not afford—does not a solemn obligation rest upon us as a free and Christian people, to lend sympathy and support to the millions of struggling Jews who desire to link their lives and fortunes to the land of their fathers and with the early memories of their race?

But why should we give legislative sanction, even in the mild form of a mere resolution of sympathy and encouragement, to this movement, you may ask? What business is it of ours where they go and where they stay? Who are the Jews, anyway, that they should be claiming the special attention of the congresses and parliaments of the nations of the earth?

My reply is that the Jews are the most extraordinary people that ever inhabited this earth and that they have been throughout all history the chief benefactors of mankind. Their achievements and benefactions have in every age been out of all proportion to their numbers. They have never numbered and do not now number more than 1 percent of the human race, and yet it has taken most of the time of the other 99 percent to keep up with them and find out what they were doing. No other race has contained and exhibited such dynamic energy in small compass. Somebody has said that 1 Jew in town creates a sensation, 2 a riot, and 3 a revolution. A man like this not only deserves but always commands special attention and respect not only from individuals and groups but from congresses and parliaments as well. This fundamental notion of race superiority and race achievement is one of the great reasons for national legislative approval of this resolution.

Another cogent political reason is that an overwhelming majority of the approximately 3,000,000 Jews of America desire the passage of this resolution, and we should certainly pay some respect to the desires of so important and respectable an element of our population and citizenship, especially when the action contemplated can do no possible harm to the rest of the country.

But how do you know, you may ask, that the majority of American Jews desire the passage of this resolution? I candidly admit that there has been no direct referendum on the subject among the Jews themselves, but I learn from the hearings before the Foreign Affairs Committee that there was an American Jewish Congress held not very long ago at Philadelphia, at which delegates representing some 360,000 Jewish voters adopted a resolution by a practically unanimous vote indorsing the Zionist movement. In this connection, I wish to quote a paragraph from the hearings containing the statement of Mr. Louis Lipsky, of New York City, who represented the Zionist Organization of America:

"The Jews of the United States held a congress 2 years ago, after the Balfour declaration of the British Government, prior to the peace conference. There were over 360,000 Jews who voted for the delegates who attended that congress. In addition to the 360,000 voters, who elected 300 delegates, there were also 100 delegates elected by the following organizations, practically every national Jewish organization: The American Jewish Committee, of which Mr. Lewis Marshall is chairman; the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, of which Mr. Adolph Kraus, of Chicago, is chairman; the Order B'rith Abraham; the Association of Orthodox Rabbis; the Independent Western Star Order; the Independent Workmen's Circle of America; the Progressive Order of the West; the United Synagogues of America, composed of the conservative congregations in the United States; the United Hebrew Trades, which represent an association of the Jewish trades-unions in New York City; the faculty of the Rabbinical College of America, of which Dr. Revell is the president; the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, which is an organization of orthodox Jewish congregations somewhat similar to the United Synagogues, except that it is more orthodox. The United Synagogues of America represents those organizations that are affiliated with the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, of which the late Dr. Schechter was president. * * *"

At this congress the following resolutions were adopted practically unanimously. There was one gentleman who voted against them:

"The American Jewish Congress, speaking for the Jews of America, expresses its appreciation of the historic and epoch-making declaration addressed by His Majesty's Government on November 2, 1917, to the Jewish people, through the Zionist organization, in which it approved of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and pledged to use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object * * * it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country."

It seems to me that the endorsement of the Zionist movement by an American Jewish congress, composed of delegates who were elected by the votes of 360,000 American Jews, is very good proof that the Jews of America very generally favor the pending resolution.

My personal observations and investigations also convince me that a large majority of them favor it. I represent a district in New York City in which at least 40 percent of the people are Jews. They represent in a high degree the wealth, culture, and refinement of American Jewry. I have talked with hundreds of them and have received letters from hundreds of others, and an overwhelming majority have expressed themselves in favor of the resolution before us. On this point, the opinion of Dr. Stephen S. Wise is the valuable testimony of an expert witness. The following telegram, signed by him, was sent during the hearings on the measure:

"Regret impossible to appear before Foreign Affairs Committee meeting Friday morning. Earnestly hope for favorable action by committee on your resolution, which represents the sympathies of the American people and meets the hopes of vast majority of American Jews.

"STEPHEN WISE."

I am proud to say that this brilliant Hebrew clergyman is one of my constituents and that I number him among my best personal friends.

I am well aware that no considerable number of American Jews will ever go to Palestine to live, even if a permanent homeland of their race is established there. But if they desire a refuge and an asylum in the land of their fathers for their suffering coreligionists scattered throughout the earth, it is our duty to pay some attention to their wishes in the matter of the passage of this resolution.

In the beginning of my speech I stated that our sense of justice and our sentiment of freedom should prompt us to pass this measure. I added that national gratitude should also prompt us, and with the subject of the gratitude of all the nations of the earth toward the Jews for immeasurable benefits received, I want now to deal briefly. I want to state why I believe that the nations of the earth are under a heavy debt of gratitude to the Jews and why they should all cooperate in the reestablishment and maintenance of a homeland in Palestine for the Jews, and in doing this I must of necessity attempt to define the just cause of gratitude and to describe the real attributes of true greatness.

I respectfully submit, my colleagues, that the true benefactor of mankind, the really great character of history, is not necessarily the king on the throne who, perchance, may have nothing upon a brainless head but a tinsel crown, nor the vulgar conqueror on the field of battle whose only title to greatness may be in the fact that millions of human beings have been slain through him. The true benefactor of mankind, the greatest character of all the race, is he who has contributed most substantially to the sum of human happiness and human good in the proclamations of the revelations of true religion, in the writing of good books, in the discovery of remedies for disease, in the founding of universities, libraries, hospitals, and asylums, and in those acts of personal service that alleviate human suffering, promote human joy, and elevate and ennoble human life.

The French people evidently acted according to the test of true greatness that I have just described when, a few years ago, at a popular election to determine which were the three greatest names in French history, they voted Pasteur first, Victor Hugo second, and Napoleon third. There are no gorgeous tombs, fit for dead deities, for Pasteur and Hugo, such as holds the ashes of the Corsican in the Invalides. No Arc de Triomphe is erected to their memory and to perpetuate their deeds. But the sane French judgment declared the physician and the writer greater than the warrior, proclaimed the discoverer of the remedy for rabies and the author of Les Miserables greater than the victor of Austerlitz and Marengo.

Under this test of greatness the Jew is the greatest man of all this world, and to him should go out the deep gratitude and unstinted praise of all the nations, for he has been the unchallenged leader of the race in religion and a close and dangerous competitor in every form of intellectual triumph.

In the British House of Lords recently Lord Balfour, author of the Balfour declaration, delivered a powerful and impassioned speech in favor of a homeland for the Jews in Palestine. In a cable from London to the New York Herald of Thursday, June 22, I find the following paragraph:

"An interesting feature of Lord Balfour's speech was a long and eloquent passage dealing with the tribulations of the Jewish race, their valuable contributions to art, philosophy, science, and religion, and the suggestion that Christendom should take the chance of giving the Jews a home where, in peace and quietness, they might develop their culture and traditions."

The sentiments attributed to Lord Balfour by this cabled dispatch are, in my humble judgment, the most just and powerful plea that can be made for Jewish rights to a distinct nationality and a separate home, namely, that his sufferings and tribulations, which I have sought to describe in the course of my remarks, as well as his spiritual and intellectual triumphs, which I shall now attempt briefly to describe, entitle him to special consideration and kindly treatment at the hands of the Christian nations of the world.

JEWISH ACHIEVEMENTS AS A GROUND FOR GRATITUDE

As religionist

In the religious triumphs of history the Jew has been incomparable and supreme. In the beginning God appointed him His vicegerent on earth, clothed him with authority plenipotentiary in Divine affairs, and revealed to him His oracles, with instructions to teach them to his own and to transmit them to all future generations of men.

The three great monotheistic faiths of mankind are Judaism, Christianity, and Mahometanism. The second is derived from the first and the third from the other two. All had their origin in Judean hills; all their birth and inspiration in the Old Testament of the Jews.

The mountains and valleys of Palestine are dotted with Jewish synagogues, Christian temples, and Mohammedan mosques, in which native worshippers and pilgrims from all the world kneel at the shrine of the Hebrew prophets.

"On the top of Mount Sinai", says Disraeli in Tancred, "are two ruins, a Christian church and a Mahomet mosque. In this the sublimest scene of Arabian glory, Israel and Ishmael alike raised their altars to the great God of Abraham."

Montesquieu likens the Jewish religion to the trunk of an old tree that has produced two branches which cover the earth. These branches are Christianity and Mahometanism. Again he compares Judaism to a mother who has given birth to two daughters that have turned upon and covered the aged parent with wounds:

"La religion juive est un vieux tronc qui a produit deux branches qui ont couvert toute la terre, je veux dire le Mahométisme et le Christianisme; ou plutôt c'est une mère qui a engendre deux filles qui l'ont accablée de mille plaies" (Lettres Persanes, LX).

It must be remembered that Mahometans do not reject Moses and the prophets; nor do they reject Jesus. Mohammed believed and taught that Jesus was inspired but not divine. Mahometans class Jesus among the great prophets of Jehovah, but deny that he was a man-God by immaculate conception. Mohammedanism rests upon the double basis of Judaism and Christianity. Paganism enters as an element but cannot be considered as a basic principle.

"We follow", says the Koran, "the religion of Abraham the orthodox, who was no idolator. We believe in God and that which hath been sent down unto Abraham and Ismael and Isaac and Jacob and the tribes, and that which was delivered unto Moses and Jesus, and that which was delivered unto the prophets from the Lord. We make no distinction between any of them, and to God we are resigned" (Koran, chap. 2).

Mohammedans contend that the Pentateuch was the moral and legal code of men in the early ages of the world; that when Jesus Christ appeared the law of Moses was superseded by the Gospels; and that with the coming of Mohammed the Koran displaced them all and became the final guide of men. This book they declare to be the completion of the law, since no more divine revelations are to follow, and they worship Mohammed as the last and very greatest of the prophets that have revealed the will of God to man.

It may be added that there are, in round numbers, about 565,000,000 Christians, 240,000,000 Mahometans, and 15,000,000 Jews on the earth, a total of 820,000,000. These numbers are in the aggregate only about one half the population of the globe, but they represent the progress, enlightenment, and civilization of mankind.

The Jew is thus the founder and master builder of the great spiritual temple of the human race, whose corner stone is Hebrew prophecy and whose gorgeous domes are the claims of Jesus and Mahomet to the messiahship of God.

All mankind should be profoundly grateful to the Jew for the precious gift of monotheism, which is the basis of all these faiths, and every nation should help restore him to his ancient homeland, in which monotheism flourished in pristine glory and in mortal combat with polytheism and paganism in the early ages of the world. No praise too high can be said, no help too great can be rendered to the children of the race that emerged from the plains of Mesopotamia in the twilight of history and from their Lilliputian kingdom in Palestine sent forth a religion not only for the earth but for the universe.

All praise, all honor, and all gratitude to the Jew for the gift of the Bible, whose Mosaic code is the most potent juridical as well as spiritual agency in the universe and whose Gospels are the most perfect flowers of all the religious literature of the world. The Bible is everywhere to be found—in the jungles of Africa, while crossing burning deserts, and amidst Arctic snows. No ship ever puts to sea without this sacred treasure. It is found in the cave of the hermit, in the hut of the peasant, in the palace of the king, and in the Vatican of the Pope. Its divine precepts furnish elements of morals and manliness in formative life to jubilant youth; cast a radiant charm about the strength of lusty manhood; and when life's pilgrimage is ended, offer to the dying patriarch who clasps it to his bosom a sublime solace as he crosses the Great Divide and passes into the twilight's purple gloom. This noble book has furnished not only the most enduring laws and the sublimest religious truths but inspiration as well to the grandest intellectual triumphs. It is literally woven into the literature of the world, and few books of modern times are worth reading that do not reflect the sentiments of its sacred pages. All honor to the Jew who wrote it and gave it to us!

All praise, all honor, and all gratitude to the Jew for the gift of the Talmud, defined by Emanuel Deutsch as "a Corpus Juris, an encyclopedia of law—civil and penal, ecclesiastical and international, human and divine."

To appreciate the message and mission of the Talmud its contents must be viewed and contemplated in the light of both literature and history. As a literary production it is a masterpiece—strange, weird, and unique—but a masterpiece nevertheless. It is a sort of spiritual and intellectual cosmos in which the brain growth and soul burst of a great race found expression during a thousand years. As an encyclopedia of faith and scholarship it reveals the noblest thoughts and highest aspirations of a divinely commissioned race. Whatever the master spirits of Judaism in Palestine and Babylon esteemed worthy of thought and devotion was explained in its pages. It thus became a great twin messenger, with the Bible, of Hebrew civilization to all the races of mankind and to all the centuries yet to come. To Hebrews it is still the great storehouse of information touching the legal, political, and religious traditions of their fathers in many lands and ages. To the Biblical critic of any faith it is an invaluable help to Bible exegesis, and to all in the world who care for the sacred and the solemn it is a priceless, literary treasure.

As a historical factor the Talmud has only remotely affected the great currents of Gentile history. But to Judaism it has been the cementing bond in every time of persecution and threatened dissolution. It was carried from Babylon to Egypt, northern Africa, Spain, Italy, France, Germany, and Poland. And when threatened with national and race destruction the children of Abraham in every land bowed themselves above its sacred pages and caught therefrom inspiration to renewed life and higher effort.

The Hebrews of every age have held the Talmud in extravagant reverence as the greatest sacred heirloom of their race. Their supreme affection for it has placed it above even the Bible. It is an adage with them that "the Bible is salt; the Mischna, pepper; the Gemara, balmy spice"; and Rabbi Solomon ben Joseph sings:

"The Kabbala and Talmud hoar
Than all the phophets prize I more;
For water is all Bible lore,
But Mischna is pure wine."

"More than any other human agency has the Talmud been instrumental in creating that strangest of all political phenomena—a nation without a country, a race without a fatherland."

As physician

Jewish achievements in medicine have been unsurpassed by those of any other race. To carry healing, both spiritual and physical, to the nations seems to have been the peculiar mission of the Jew. To preserve the body on earth and to save the soul in heaven have been the chief objects of his care and solicitude in history.

In human history as a whole the Jew has had less formidable competition in medicine than in any other science. He was the physician par excellence of the Middle Ages. A superstitious reverence attached to his healing powers, so much so that when he became a convert to Christianity he was rejected as physician, because it was supposed that the change of religion had robbed him of the secrets of his art. Francis I, King of France, refused to employ a converted Jew as court physician for this reason. Thus closely were Jewish genius and the science of medicine identified in olden days.

The practice of medicine was an integral part of the religion of the ancient Hebrews, who regarded health and disease as emanating from the same divine source. "I kill, and I make alive; I wound, and I heal", suggested to the Hebrew mind the origin of every malady to which the flesh was heir. Medicine, then, was a sacred science; its practice was a divine calling, and the physician was the messenger of God. The strength of this sentiment may be imagined when it is remembered that the Bible identifies the blood with the soul (Genesis ix, 4). The Talmudists regard blood as the essential principle of life (Hul. 125a).

Time forbids an enumeration of all the kings, emperors, and Popes who had Jewish physicians. Just a few may be mentioned by way of illustration. Maimonides was court physician to the Turkish Sultan Saladin, and, according to the Arabian historian Al-Kitti, he declined a similar position offered him by Richard Coeur-de-Lion, afterward Richard I, King of England. Queen Elizabeth of England had as court physician Rodrigo Lopez, a Spanish Jew. Farragut, a Jew, was court physician to Charlemagne. Jacob Ben Jechiel Loans, a Jew, was physician to Emperor Frederick III, of Germany, and received from that monarch the order of knighthood. Elias Montalto, a Jew, was physician to Maria di Medici. King Charles IV, of Denmark, had as court physician Benjamin Musafia, a Jew.

A complete list of Popes and potentates who employed physicians of Jewish blood would be too long to read. And let it be understood that Popes and princes had no monopoly upon the medical skill of the Jews. Their beneficent deeds enrich the pages of all history. Maestre Bernal, ship physician, and Marco, ship surgeon to Columbus, were both Jews. Suffice it to say that in all ages and in all lands, from the hut of the peasant to the palace of the king and the Vatican of the Pope, they have crept silently in to minister to the sufferings of humanity.

And it may be confidently asserted that the modern Jew as physician is not unworthy of his people's illustrious past. While the Jews cannot justly claim monopoly in the triumphs of modern medicine, every race having its great ornaments and lights, yet it cannot be truthfully denied that they are most worthy among the disciples of Æsculapius, Hippocrates, and Galen.

It may be safely asserted that before the Great War the medical department of the University of Vienna was without a superior in the world. Students from every continent flocked in great numbers to this celebrated school of medicine. Suffice it to say, as a final tribute to the skill of the Jew as physician, that 12 of the professorships of this famous university were held by Jews in 1900.

As philanthropist

Closely identified with religion and medicine, in the matter of healing, mercy, and love, is philanthropy.

One of the most stupendous acts of charity recorded in history was that of a Jew, Baron Hirsch, who donated $100,000,000 to philanthropic purposes. This donation was made to help his suffering and struggling coreligionists throughout the world.

A single sentence is a key to the character of this magnanimous, generous-hearted man. A friend sent him a message of sympathy when he lost his only child in 1887. Hirsch sent this reply:

"My son I have lost, but not my heir; humanity is my heir."

Another distinguished Jewish philanthropist was Sir Moses Montefiore, who devoted his life and fortune to works of charity. The celebration of his one hundredth birthday was almost a national event in England. Telegrams of congratulation were received from Queen Victoria, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, as well as from thousands of beneficiaries of his philanthropy throughout the world.

The charity of no other race is so well organized, so systematic, and so universal as that of the Jew. Like everything else Jewish, it has a scriptural basis. "Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brethren and shall surely lend him sufficient for his need in that which he wanteth" is the foundation of all Jewish philanthropy.

More than 200 years ago the burghers of New Amsterdam gave permission to a few Jews to settle among them "upon condition that they should always support their own poor." In the light of history, ancient and modern, this condition was superfluous and even amusing. In no age of the world have Jews permitted Gentiles to take care of their poor. They have frequently contributed generously to Gentile charity funds, but have generally refused to receive anything in return. Sir Moses Montefiore, at the age of 76, went to the office of the London Times after midnight to solicit relief for the Christians of Syria. He himself subscribed £200 and personally collected over £20,000. These things he did for the persecutors of his race.

In 1860 Adolphe Crémieux, the celebrated Jewish advocate of France, addressed an impassioned appeal to his coreligionists throughout Europe in behalf of the starving Christians of Lebanon. Was this appeal not genuinely of the spirit of Christ? Did not Crémieux ask his fellow Jews to "turn the other cheek" and to "do good for evil"?

Even the munificent gifts of Baron Hirsch were not confined to members of his own race. He is recorded as saying:

"In relieving human suffering I never ask whether the cry of necessity comes from a being who belongs to my faith or not; but what is more natural than that I should find my highest purpose in bringing to the followers of Judaism who have been oppressed for a thousand years, who are starving in misery, the possibilities of a physical and moral regeneration?"

As philosopher

Philo, Maimonides, Spinoza, and Mendelssohn were great Jewish philosophers.

Philo was an Alexandrian philosopher and a contemporary of Jesus. His learning was prodigious. He was deeply versed in grammar, rhetoric, music, Greek literature, and all the physical and mathematical sciences of his age as well as in everything that was Hebrew in religion and philosophy.

Maimonides, "the Jewish Aristotle", possessed the finest intellect of all the learned men of the Middle Ages. His great endeavor seems to have been to reconcile divine with human wisdom as manifested by Aristotle.

Spinoza was a Dutch-Jewish philosopher, a pupil oif the Amsterdam Talmud Torah, a man whose utter intellectual fearlessness embroiled him constantly, in matters of religion and philosophy, with his coreligionists, causing the Rabbis to try him and to place him first under the lesser and later under the great ban, and finally to drive him to a renunciation of Judaism.

In Professor Herz's studio at Berlin is a bust of Mendelssohn, upon which is the following inscription:

"Moses Mendelssohn,
The greatest sage since Socrates,
His own Nation's glory
Any Nation's ornament,
The confidant
Of Lessing and of Truth,
He died
As he lived
Serene and wise."

As historian

Josephus, Neander, Graetz, Palgrave, and Geiger were Jewish historians, who rank among the greatest in the world.

Josephus, after nearly 2,000 years, is the great authority on Jewish history of ancient times. His only rival for the first place among Jewish historians is Graetz, author of "The History of the Jews from the Earliest Times to the Present Day."

As astronomer and mathematician

The greatest astronomer and mathematician of Jewish blood was Sir William Herschel. Other great mathematicians were Sylvester, sometime professor of mathematics at Johns Hopkins University; Jacobi, German-Jewish mathematician, after whom certain intricate functions are termed "Jacobians"; Filipowski, compiler of antilogarithmetic tables; Gomperts, Terquem, and Kronecker.

The fame of Dr. Albert Einstein is not yet permanently established, but there are many competent judges in the world who believe that he will yet take his place in the history of the science of astronomy and mathematics at the side of Sir Isaac Newton.

As orator and statesman

Disraeli, Gambetta, Castelar, Lasker, Benjamin, and Rathenau were Jews.

Benjamin Disraeli in England, Leon Gambetta in France, Emilio Castelar in Spain, Judah P. Benjamin in America, Edward Lasker and Walter Rathenau in Germany were types of all that is superb in oratory and profound in statesmanship.

As British Prime Minister, Disraeli launched the world policy of Queen Victoria and made her Empress of India. The high-water mark of Jewish success in statesmanship was reached by this eminent Hebrew, and when he died the English laid him to rest in Westminster Abbey among their kings, statesmen, and heroes.

Gambetta, of Genoese-Jewish extraction, was the greatest orator of the French, with the possible exception of Mirabeau. He was a fierce and uncompromising republican, and his grandest oratorical efforts were panegyrics of republicanism.

Emilio Castelar, a Jew, was the most famous Spanish orator of any time. Instances are related where strangers traveled from distant points in Europe to Madrid to hear him speak an hour before the Cortes. When he addressed this body in later life the chamber was always crowded and cards of admission commanded an exorbitant price. His genius was so pronounced that all parties delighted to honor him. His oration on the candidacy of Amadeus for the kingship of Spain is the most gorgeous production in oratorical literature. It is a perfect "field of cloth of gold" in metaphor and imagery. He was chief magistrate and virtual dictator of the short-lived Spanish Republic from September 1874 to January 1875.

Judah P. Benjamin was the ablest and most illustrious Jew ever born in the Western Hemisphere. He was very great as orator, statesman, and lawyer. His political career was comprised in public service within the offices of United States Senator from Louisiana and of Attorney General, Secretary of War, and Secretary of State, successively, of the Confederate States of America.

Edward Lasker, once leader of the Liberal Party in the German Reichstag, was the only man whom Bismarck ever feared in parliamentary debate. He was an enthusiastic patriot and altogether above reproach. In general outline he closely resembled the late Carl Schurz in independent notions and lofty ideals.

Walter Rathenau, late Minister of Foreign Affairs of the German Republic, was a Jew. He was the mainstay of the cabinet of Chancellor Wirth, and the Germans were beginning to look to him as the Moses who would lead them out of the wilderness of economic disaster and death. His assassination a few days ago was an irreparable loss to Germany and a distinct menace to the peace of the world.

As financier

Jewish genius in finance has become proverbial and need not be discussed by me. Suffice it to say that the Rothschilds determined for decades in Europe questions of peace and war. Other great Jewish financiers in Europe are the Bleichröders, of Germany. The Schiffs, Seligmans, and Guggenheims are well-known American financiers.

As labor leader and political economist

The world has been so long accustomed to regard the Jew as a financier and to identify his genius and achievements with finance that the statement may seem strange to some that several among the world's greatest labor leaders have been Jews. The average Jew cannot decry either capital or labor without denouncing the occupations and assaulting the reputations of many of the most illustrious of his race. If capital has numbered among its greatest exponents the Rothschilds, Bleichröders, and Seligmans, labor has counted among its grandest champions other great Jewish names: Karl Marx, Ferdinand Lassalle, Victor Adler, and Samuel Gompers.

As actor

Jewish genius has been incomparable on the stage. The greatest actress dead, with the possible exception of the English actress, Mrs. Siddons, was Rachel, a Jewess. The greatest living actress, indeed, the greatest actress that ever lived, is Sarah Bernhardt, a Jewess. The greatest of modern actors was Adolph von Sonnenthal, a Jew, the dramatic idol of the Austrian capital during 3 decades. A few years ago the New York Herald printed an article on Sonnenthal. The following are two paragraphs from that article:

"In 1881 was celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his connection with the Hofburg Theater. The people went wild with enthusiasm. After the performance they took the horses from the carriage and drew him through the streets. Among the distinguished persons who witnessed the performance was the Emperor of Austria, the Crown Prince, and all the members of the court.

"There is in Austria an imperial mandate forbidding audiences to call actors before the curtain, but on this night it was revoked by special permission and Sonnenthal was called out no less than 42 times."

As musician

Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Offenbach, Goldmark, Joachim, Rubinstein, and Strauss were Jews. It may be contended, and with truth, that no one of these musicians possessed the musical genius of Wagner, Mozart, or Beethoven; but, nevertheless, each one of them was a master of his art and the history of music would not be complete without mention of the names of all of them.

As poet

The author of the Book of Job and the author of the Book of Psalms were doubtless Hebrews and were the greatest of all Hebrew poets, for the poetry of Job and the poetry of the Psalms are incomparably the noblest of all poetry of all the literature of the earth.

The greatest of modern Jewish poets were Jehuda Halevi, of Spain, author of the Elegy of Zion, and Heinrich Heine, of Germany, author of The Lorelei.

As painter and sculptor

Hebrew civilization has not been very greatly enriched by triumphs in art. In neither painting nor sculpture have the sons of Israel succeeded grandly. The annals of Hebrew great names reveal no Phidias, no Appelles, no Canova, no Raphael. In every sphere of intellectual and spiritual activity, excepting art, Hebrew genius has scored magnificent victories. And failure in art was not remotely due to barrenness of intellect or soul but to the heavenly decree, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in the heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." During all the ages this divine command from Sinai paralyzed and destroyed Hebrew creative genius in works of art. More than once Josephus calls attention to the effect of this ordinance upon the national life of Israel.

It is worthy of note that the express command of the law forbidding images was not more potent in the destruction of plastic art than was the spirit of the Hebrew faith in its warfare upon idolatry among pagan nations. Greco-Roman polytheism offered the highest incentive to the development of art. To bring the gods in ever more beautiful forms before the eye of the worshipper was the great aim of the Greek and Roman artists.

But diametrically opposed to the pagan conception of the forms and number of the heavenly powers was Hebrew monotheism that believed in but one God, who was purely spiritual, and therefore invisible, intangible, and unapproachable. Judaism delighted to lift its deity above the sensual, material, and corporeal things of earth and to represent Him as a pure and sinless spirit. This conception of the Creator of the Universe and this monotheistic faith, which was in direct antagonism to polytheistic belief, were equally destructive of plastic art with the express command of the law itself. And this is more certainly true since the highest inspiration to triumphs in art in every age have been the actions of the gods and goddesses themselves. The masterpiece of ancient art was the Olympian Zeus of Phidias. The masterpiece of modern art is the Sistine Madonna of Raphael. And when the Hebrews forbade the representation of their Deity in plastic form they shut out the highest inspiration to artistic triumph.

Again, the Hebrew sense of chastity was offended by the immorality of pagan myths as embodied in plastic form. The artistic beauty of certain Greek and Roman statues the Hebrews believed was better fitted to deprave than to purify the moral sentiments of mankind. They saw that the Rape of Ganymede, sanctifying pederasty in marble, was a masterpiece of Grecian sculpture. They felt that the painting of Aphrodite, ensnared and caught in a net with Ares, was not too well calculated to instill pure and virtuous thoughts in the minds of tender youth and of modest maidens who looked upon and contemplated it. They knew that every street corner of Athens and of Rome was marked by an image of some god whose mythic history was filled with inebriety and lust. The Hebrew conscience shrank with terror and with loathing from the serpent of immorality coiled beneath the marble flowers of Grecian and Roman art.

The blighting effect of the Sinaic condemnation of art fell upon architecture as well as upon painting and sculpture. The houses of ancient Palestine were wholly destitute of artistic beauty, and the palaces and the temples at Jerusalem were constructed after non-Jewish models. Roman architecture was employed in the building of the magnificent palace of Herod; and the Phœnician workmen from Tyre and Sidon were imported to build the temples of Solomon and Zerubbabel (Ezra iii, 7).

Let it be said, however, that modern Judaism seems to have broken completely away from the ancient prohibition concerning images, and modern Jewish art is beginning to develop into forms of great beauty and power. Solomon J. Solomon ranks among the greatest of English artists, and Joseph Israels has glorified the art of painting in his celebrated delineations of Dutch fisher life. It is probable that the greatest of all Jewish sculptors was Moses J. Ezekiel, born in Richmond, Va., whose works have been exhibited in the chief art centers of Europe, and whose statue of "Religious Liberty" adorns Fairmount Park, Philadelphia.

Mr. Speaker, I could spend the entire day telling the Members of this House about the triumphs of Jewish genius in religion, literature, science, and art if time permitted and occasion demanded, but I must stop. I could proceed to describe further his triumphs in fiction and romance and in the minor subjects of botany and biology and philology and chess playing, in all of which Jewish genius has shone brilliantly. But I repeat that I must stop.

The only justification for this lengthy discussion of Jewish achievement is that it serves to emphasize my hearty approval of the contention of Lord Balfour in his recent speech before the House of Lords that Jewish achievements, constituting civilization's most valuable contribution, entitle the Jew to the sympathy, encouragement, and aid of the civilized nations of the earth in the matter of helping to reestablish for him a homeland in Palestine.

Reduced to the plainest terms of colloquial formula, the Jew may say this to the Christian peoples of the earth: I have given you the sublimest religious truths in the laws of Moses, in the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, in the songs of David, and in the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth. In these laws and prophecies and songs and teachings I have pointed you the way to a blessed and an eternal life. I have given you much that is grand and beautiful in literature, music, and art. With my hands tied behind me and my heart burdened to the breaking point with a bitter load of hatred and persecution, I have yet managed from the cave of the prophets and from the manger of the Christ, from the filth of the Judengasse, and from the darkness of the hovels of the ghetto to contribute more than my share to the great cause of liberty, humanity, and civilization among men. Now, will you not help me? Will you not aid me in the reestablishment of a homeland among the sacred places of my race, where I can escape persecution, where I can once again feel the pride and thrill of free and national life, and where the banner of the Jew can once again float proudly from the battlements of Jerusalem? If mankind is not ungrateful and if civilization is not craven, the answer to this question will be "yes" in language, and assistance in action translated immediately into deeds.

OBJECTIONS TO THE ZIONIST MOVEMENT

But are there no objections to the Zionist movement and consequently to the pending resolution, you may ask? Certainly. There was never a noble enterprise or a great movement in the history of the world that somebody did not rise and object. Christianity itself was not founded without the crucifixion of its Author and without centuries of persecution of His followers. The American Republic was not established until after the English people had offered bitter and bloody objection during 7 years and 8 months of arduous toil and bitter struggle. Tariff bills are never passed in this House without serious objection from the Democrats, and rivers and harbors bills providing for the irrigation of southern rivers would go through if objections were not made by Republicans. We should not be bothered by objections, but we should hear them freely and answer them candidly and fairly.

It must be candidly admitted that a considerable number of very intelligent and patriotic Jews in America are opposed to the Zionist movement and object to the passage of this resolution. I believe that they are in a decided minority, but the very structure and genius of our Government, as well as its finest traditions, demand fair play for minorities and protection for their rights whenever possible, and we must hear and consider their plea in this case patiently and fully. To this end, I have read the hearings on this resolution before the Foreign Affairs Committee carefully three times from beginning to end. I resolved in the beginning of the consideration of this subject not to act hastily, and I have arrived at my conclusions after prolonged and diligent research.

The time at my disposal does not permit me to consider other than the leading objections that have been made to the project of founding for the Jews a homeland in Palestine and to the passage of this resolution, and, in order to proceed clearly and systematically, I shall classify at once these objections.

The opponents of political Zionism, which is proposed by this resolution, as opposed to orthodox Zionism and to economic Zionism, about which there seems to be little dispute among the Jews, make the following main contentions:

1. That political Zionism—that is, a political state in Palestine for the Jewish people—is not desirable or permissible, since Judaism is a religion and not a nationality, and since the Jews are nationals of the country in which they are born and in which they live and should be faithful to the land of their birth and of their domicile.

2. That political Zionism cannot be realized in Palestine; that is, that a political state cannot be established with the Jews in dominant control without violating the rights, under principles of self-determination, of the non-Jewish races of the country.

I believe that this is a full and fair statement of the two great objections of the opponents of the pending resolution, and I shall discuss them as briefly as possible in the order in which I have stated them.

Regarding the first objection, I wish to quote Rabbi Philipson, of Cincinnati, one of the opponents of this resolution. At the hearings before the Foreign Affairs Committee, Dr. Philipson said:

"There are those of us who feel that Jewish nationalism does not express the true interpretation of Judaism. We feel that Judaism is a religion and that we are nationals of the country in which we are born and in which we live."

In support of his views and contention, Dr. Philipson read the following resolution of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations at one of their meetings at Richmond, Va.:

"We are unalterably opposed to political Zionism. The Jews are not a nation but a religious community. Zion was a precious possession of the past, the early home of our faith, where our prophets uttered their world-subduing thoughts, and our psalmists sang their world-enchanting hymns. As such it is a holy memory, but it is not our hope of the future. America is our Zion. Here, in the home of religious liberty, we have aided in founding this new Zion, the fruition of the beginning laid in the old. The mission of Judaism is spiritual, not political. Its aim is not to establish a state but to spread the truths of religion and humanity throughout the world."

This is all splendid and inspiring sentiment, and when the Jews at Richmond proclaimed America their Zion we are compelled to applaud their patriotism. But I know that they will pardon me if I remind them, even with a slight touch of sarcasm and cynicism, that the Zionist movement is not intended primarily for American Jews, who are happy in the possession of American citizenship and in comparative freedom from religious persecution. It is intended primarily for the wretched Jews of Russia, Rumania, and Poland who are practically shut out from this American Zion by foolishly rigid immigration laws.

Dr. Philipson and the Jews at Richmond, in drawing too nice distinctions concerning the meaning and mission of Judaism, seem to have forgotten that there are certainly differences at times between a Jew as a man and a Jew as a religionist. A certain analyst is said to have discovered that Jews and Judaism are identical, and that if Jewish blood be examined under a microscope floating particles of the Bible and the Talmud may be found. This is all well as a matter of humor, but I insist that there is such a thing as a Jew who is a man, a human being, a citizen, and a patriot, and this aside from any consideration of religion or religious belief. I further contend that this man is entitled to the rights of a freeman, which include benefits of independent nationality and citizenship, and protection, furthermore, against bodily oppression as well as religious persecution.

Believing this, I shall support this resolution and vote for it, because it tends to establish and preserve these rights to the oppressed and persecuted Jews of southeastern Europe who will never be able to reach our shores because of the inhospitable barriers that have been erected against them.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the attitude of Dr. Philipson and of the Jews of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations at Richmond and their attempt to define Jewish citizenship and nationality are nothing new in history. They are merely a revival of recurring inquiries and discussions of the subject that have taken place in every age of the world since the beginning of the Jewish dispersion. I ask the indulgence of the House while I discuss briefly this phase of the subject.

After the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) the Jew was a wanderer for many centuries upon the earth without a home and country. Until the closing years of the eighteenth century the Christian governments of Europe denied him the simplest rights of a free man and a citizen. While not a slave in the sense of chattel property, the Jews were frequently regarded as an attachment of the soil, like the ancient Spartan helots, and were transferred from one sovereign to another. At other times, having been despoiled of their goods, they were expelled wholesale and without ceremony from the countries which they had come to regard as their homes.

The explusion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 by an edict of Ferdinand and Isabella was a most painful epoch in the history of the Hebrew race. The real reason of this wholesale persecution was the fact that the Jews refused to become Christians when commanded to do so by a fanatically pious Spanish sovereign. According to Isidore Loeb, 165,000 Jews left their homes and wandered away into exile in foreign lands. History relates many pathetic incidents that marked the beginning of this dispersion. Great numbers of the Jewish community of Segovia passed the last 3 days of their stay in the city in the Jewish cemetery, fasting and wailing over being parted from their beloved dead. Jews were not permitted to inhabit Spain again until 1858, when a republic was established, and a repeal of the ancient edict of expulsion was secured from General Prim through the influence of H. Guedella, of London. But even then they were not allowed rights of unrestricted citizenship.

The French Revolution brought liberty and equality to Jews as well as to Gentiles in France, and gave rights of citizenship to all.

The Jews were not completely emancipated in England until 1858, when they were admitted to Parliament without being compelled to take the oath, "On the faith of a true Christian."

It must not be imagined, however, that the free and enlightened policies of France, England, and the United States have been elsewhere pursued. Very few substantial rights of citizenship were enjoyed prior to the Russian Revolution under Kerensky by either Russian or Rumanian Jews; and, it may be added, nearly 7,000,000 Jews, about one half of the total Jewish population of the earth, lived at that time in Russia and Rumania.

The political status of the Jew 150 years ago was a puzzle to the brainiest statesmen of Europe. Although the year 1793 witnessed the revolutionary emancipation of the Jews in France, Napoleon did not afterward regard them as citizens. He once said:

"The Jews are not in the same category with the Christians. We have to judge them by the political not the civil right, for they are not citizens."

And to gain desired information concerning them for the purpose of framing appropriate legislation for the Jews in the general reconstruction of the Empire after the French Revolution, he propounded the following 12 questions to the Sanhedrin of France:

"1. Is it lawful for Jews to have more than one wife?

"2. Is divorce allowed by the Jewish religion? Is divorce valid, although pronounced not by the courts of justice but by virtue of laws in contradiction to the French Code?

"3. May a Jewess marry a Christian, or a Jew a Christian woman, or does Jewish law order that the Jews should intermarry among themselves?

"4. In the eyes of the Jews are Frenchmen not of the Jewish religion considered as brethren or as strangers?

"5. What conduct does Jewish law prescribe toward Frenchmen not of the Jewish religion?

"6. Do the Jews born in France and treated by the law as French citizens acknowledge France as their country? Are they bound to defend it? Are they bound to obey the laws and follow the directions of the Civil Code?

"7. Who elects the rabbis?

"8. What kind of police jurisdiction do the rabbis exercise over the Jews? What judicial powers do they exercise over them?

"9. Are the police jurisdiction of the rabbis and the forms of election regulated by Jewish law or are they only sanctioned by custom?

"10. Are there professions from which the Jews are excluded by their law?

"11. Does Jewish law forbid the Jews to take usury from their brethren?

"12. Does it forbid or does it allow usury in dealing with strangers?"

To these questions the French Sanhedrin made the following replies:

"1. That, in conformity with the decree of Rabbi Gershon, polygamy is forbidden to the Israelites.

"2. That divorce by the Jewish law is valid only after previous decision by the civil authorities.

"3. That the religious act of marriage must be preceded by a civil contract.

"4. That every Israelite is religiously bound to consider his non-Jewish fellow citizens as brothers and to aid, protect, and love them as though they were coreligionists.

"6. That the Israelite is required to consider the land of his birth or adoption as his fatherland and shall love and defend it when called upon.

"7. That Judaism does not forbid any kind of handicraft or occupation.

"8. That it is commendable for Israelites to engage in agriculture, manual labor, and the arts, as their ancestors in Palestine were wont to do.

"9. That finally, Israelites are forbidden to exact usury from Jew or Christian."

These questions and answers formed the basis of all subsequent legislation by the French Government in regard to Jewish religious affairs and plans.

Ascher, the great Jewish teacher, framed this catechism for the Jewish youth of England:

"Has the Jew a fatherland besides Jerusalem?

"Yes; the country wherein he is bred and born, and in which he has the liberty to practice his religion, and where he is allowed to carry on traffic and trade and enjoy all the advantages and protection of the law in common with the citizens of other creeds, this country the Israelite is bound to acknowledge as his fatherland, to the benefit of which he must do his best to contribute. The sovereign who rules over this land is (after God) his sovereign; its laws, so long as they are not contradictory to the divine law, are also the Israelite's laws, and the duties of his fellow citizens are also his duties."

This catechism and the answer of the French Sanhedrin defined clearly the Jewish notion of the citizenship and fatherland of the Jews under the dispersion.

But it must be conceded that in the case of this strange and extraordinary people there is a peculiar kind of fatherland known to no other race; a fatherland not based upon the soil of earth, nor bounded by streams or mountains, nor subject to the pains and penalties of physical decay and death; a fatherland whose kingdom is of the spirit and whose law is the word of God. Hear Heine describe this fatherland:

"The Jews may console themselves for having lost Jerusalem and the temple, and the Ark of the Covenant, and the golden vessels and the precious things of Solomon. Such a loss is merely insignificant in comparison with the Bible, the imperishable treasure which they have rescued. If I do not err, it was Mahammed who named the Jews 'the people of the book', a name which has remained theirs to the present day on the earth and which is deeply characteristic. A book is their very fatherland, their treasure, their governor, their bliss, and their bane. They live within the peaceful boundaries of this book. Here they exercise their inalienable rights. Here they can neither be driven along nor despised. Here they are strong and worthy of admiration. Absorbed in the city of this book, they observed little of the changes which went on about them in the real world; nations arose and perished, States bloomed and disappeared, revolutions stormed forth out of the soil, but they laid bowed down over their book and observed nothing of the wild tumult of the times which passed over their heads."

Zebulon B. Vance, quoting Prof. M. F. Maury, compares the great human current of this strange Jewish fatherland to the Gulf Stream:

"There is a river in the ocean; in the severest droughts it never fails, and in the mightiest floods it never overflows. The Gulf of Mexico is its fountain, and its mouth is in the Arctic Seas. It is the Gulf Stream. There is in the world no other such majestic flow of water. Its current is more rapid than the Mississippi or the Amazon and its volume more than a thousand times greater. Its waters as far out from the Gulf as the Carolina coasts are of an indigo blue; they are so distinctly marked that their lines of junction with the common sea water may be traced by the eye. Often one half of a vessel may be perceived floating in the Gulf Stream water while the other half is in common water of the sea, so sharp is the line and such is the want of affinity between these waters, and such, too, the reluctance, so to speak, on the part of the Gulf Stream to mingle with the common water of the sea."

Then Mr. Vance adds—

"This curious phenomenon in the physical world has its counterpart in the moral. There is a lonely river in the midst of the ocean of mankind. The mightiest flood of human temptation has never caused it to overflow and the fiercest fires of human cruelty, though seven times heated in the furnace of religious bigotry, have never caused it to dry up, although its waves for 2,000 years have rolled crimson with the blood of its martyrs. Its fountain is in the gray dawn of the world's history, and its mouth is somewhere in the shadows of eternity. It, too, refuses to mingle with the surrounding waves, and the line which divides its restless billows from the common waters of humanity is also plainly visible to the eye. It is the Jewish race."

This conception of a fatherland above the earth and having no physical boundaries may seem to many a far-fetched thought, a strained political metaphor, but the idea is not new nor is it confined to spiritual kingdoms. Waldstein says:

"The abolition of slavery and the Renaissance are as much a fatherland as are England, Germany, France, or the United States."

Kosciusko was once asked where his country was. "Where freedom is not", was the reply of the valiant Pole; and whether in the wilderness of America or on the plains of Poland, Kosciusko felt at home and within the boundaries of his fatherland, provided his sword was unsheathed in the name of liberty.

Mr. Speaker, the historical considerations that I have just presented to the House merely show that the contentions of Dr. Philipson and his coreligionists at Richmond are nothing new, since the political status of the Jew for centuries past has been settled not only by the catechism of Ascher and the answers of the French Sanhedrin but also by the terms of the oaths taken by Jews under the naturalization laws of the different countries in which they have settled. The Ascher catechism says emphatically that "the country wherein he is bred and born" is the fatherland of the Jew. The French Sanhedrin emphatically answered the inquiry of Napoleon by saying "that the Israelite is required to consider the land of his birth or adopton as his fatherland."

All this is sensible and logical enough; indeed, it is the only rational solution of the problem of Jewish citizenship and nationality, while the Jews are scattered throughout the world and have no country of their own. No other solution or determination of the political status of the Jew could be made unless we admit the correctness of the principle that there can be a State within a State, imperium in imperio, or unless we make the Jew an outcast upon the earth, without home or country.

But in the name of reason and common sense what is there in all this that offers a serious objection to the Zionist movement or to the passage of this resolution? Is there anything fixed, eternal, unchangeable, and irrevocable in Jewish citizenship that holds the Jew forever chained to the country of his birth or adoption? Does not international law sanction change of citizenship from one country to another? Do not the immigration and naturalization laws of all nations permit expatriation and repatriation without the slightest trace of a stain of treason? Is anything more required by the laws of man, nature, or God of the Jewish citizen or of the citizen of any other race than loyalty to his country during the continuance of his citizenship?

Furthermore, is it not well to remember that the duties and obligations of the citizen toward the country and the country toward the citizen are mutual and reciprocal? Should the citizen be required to render obedience to the laws of the country, to pay taxes, to support the Government, and to defend the flag in times of war, unless the country is willing and able to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of his rights of life, liberty, and property, as well as the pursuit of happiness, at all times? If the country fails in its obligations, is not the citizen absolved from his duties?

American Jews are obedient to the laws of the country and have shown themselves true patriots in every period of our history, both in peace and war, and the Government of our country has protected them in the enjoyment of their legal and political rights. There would be no Zionist question if this state of things existed throughout the world. But what about the Jews of Russia, Rumania, and Poland? Will the opponents of this resolution seriously contend that they owe any particular love, loyalty, or allegiance to the Governments of their countries?

Permit me at this point, Mr. Speaker, to consider the second of the main objections to political Zionism and to the passage of this resolution. It has been urged by the opponents of this measure that the principle of the right of self-determination would be violated by the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine with the Jews in dominant control. It is pointed out by these opponents that the entire population of Palestine is about 700,000, and that of this number about 500,000 are Mahommetan Arabs, about 110,000 are Christians of various sects and denominations, and that about 90,000 are Jews. It is urged that, upon the principle of the right of self-determination, these 500,000 Arabs should not be compelled to submit to the domination of a Jewish minority in the country.

Mr. Speaker, I believe firmly in the doctrine of self-government or self-determination as representing a sacred principle in government. Lincoln's "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" is not possible without strict observance and application of the rights of self-determination. But I must insist that it does not become the American Congress or the American Government to prate too loudly at this time about the sacred rights of the Arabs in Palestine, in the light of our treatment of the Filipinos during the last quarter of a century, and in view of the fact that every civilized nation of the earth, excepting the United States, has acknowledged the independence de jure of Estonia and Latvia upon principles of self-determination.

Our American theories of government are always glittering successes, but our practices are ofttimes dismal failures. We boast of personal liberty in America and then tolerate the Volstead Act upon the statute books. I say to you that there will be no genuine personal liberty in America again until that act is repealed or radically modified. But I shall not stop to discuss or denounce prohibition, since the subject of debate is the Zionist movement.

I want to make very clear and emphatic at this time, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, my attitude and views upon the Arab question in Palestine. I am in favor of carrying out one of the three following policies, to be preferred in the order in which they are named:

(1) That the Arabs shall be permitted to remain in Palestine under Jewish government and domination, and with their civil and religious rights guaranteed to them through the British mandate and under terms of the Balfour declaration.

(2) That if they will not consent to Jewish government and domination, they shall be required to sell their lands at a just valuation and retire into the Arab territory, which has been assigned to them by the League of Nations in the general reconstruction of the countries of the East.

(3) That if they will not consent to Jewish government and domination, under conditions of right and justice, or to sell their lands at a just valuation and to retire into their own countries, they shall be driven from Palestine by force.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss briefly each of these alternatives in order. And first let me read the now celebrated Balfour declaration, dated November 2, 1917, during the progress of the Great War, and afterward incorporated in the preamble of the British mandate authorized by the League of Nations. The Balfour declaration was in the following language:

"His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by the Jews in any other country."

If this is not a condensed and at the same time a complete bill of rights both for the Arabs of Palestine and for the Jews who intend to remain in their present homelands outside of Palestine, I have never read or seen one. It is conceded by the Arabs themselves that the present government of the country under the British mandate and through the Zionist organization as an administrative agency is infinitely better than the government of the Turks who were chased out of the country by Allenby, the British general. It is probably better than any that the Arabs could create and maintain for themselves.

I respectfully submit that the Arabs in Palestine should be, and would be, happy and contented under the present government of that country if it were not for Turkish and Arab agitators, who travel around over the land stirring up trouble by making false representations concerning the true character of the Zionist movement, and by preaching a kind of holy war against the immigrant Jews who arrive from day to day. The Arabs are well represented in the personnel of the present Palestine administration, which has recognized their language as one of the official languages of the country, and has given official standing to the Moslem religion.

There is no good reason why the Jews and Arabs should not live together in perfect peace and harmony in Palestine. They are all Semitic in blood and language, and all worship the same God and the same Hebrew prophets. Instead of being antagonistic there is every racial and religious reason for peace and harmony.

In the second place, if the Arabs do not wish to remain in Palestine under Jewish government and domination, there is plenty of room outside in purely Arab surroundings. The British Government and her allies made overtures and gave pledges to the Arab people to furnish them lands and protect their freedom in consideration of Arab alliance with the Allies during the World War. That pledge has been kept. The Hedjaz Kingdom was established in ancient Arabia, and Hussein, Grand Sheriff of Mecca, was made king and freed from all Turkish influence. The son of King Hussein, Prince Feisal, is now the head of the Kingdom of Mesopotamia, and Arab predominance in that country has been assured by the Allies to the Arab people.

Mesopotamia is alone capable of absorbing 30,000,000 people, according to a report submitted to the British Government by the great English engineer, Sir William Wilcocks. Arab rights are also fully recognized and protected by the French mandate over Syria. There are also several flourishing Arabic cultural and political colonies in Egypt. In short, the Arab-speaking populations of Asia and Africa number about 38,000,000 of souls and occupy approximately 2,375,000 square miles, many times larger than the territory of Great Britain. In other words, under the reconstruction of the map of the East, the Arabs have been given practical control of Greater Arabia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and parts of Egypt, which gives them an average of 38 acres per person. If the Arabs are compelled to leave Palestine and turn it over entirely to the Jews, it is admitted that the Arab race would still be one of the wealthiest landowning races on the earth. Therefore I contend that if they will not consent to live peaceably with the Jews, they should be made to sell their lands and retire to places reserved for them somewhere in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, or Egypt, that suit them best, and where they can worship Allah, Mohammed, and the Koran to their heart's content. After all is said, the fact remains that the Arabs have more lands than they need, and the Jews have none. I am in favor of a readjustment under the Balfour declaration, without too great regard to nice distinctions in the matter of the question of self-determination. This thought brings me to my third proposal heretofore mentioned, that the Arabs should be driven out of Palestine by the British and Jews, or by somebody else, if they will not listen to the voice of reason and of justice.

I shall probably be told that, regardless of the question of land and property rights, the Arabs have an interest in the holy places around Jerusalem. Admitting that their claims in this regard are just, there should be no trouble along this line. There is no reason to believe that Jews and Christians would deny them access to the holy places in the pilgrimages that they might desire to make from their Arab countries. But if the rights of the Jews to their ancient homeland are to be made dependent, as a final question, upon Moslem interests in the holy places around Jerusalem, I am willing and prepared to repudiate these rights entirely and to shut the Arabs out altogether.

Mr. Speaker, I despise and hate race prejudice and religious bigotry worse than I do the devil and all his ways. But I must confess that feelings of intolerance arise in my mind and heart when I hear any attempted justification of Mahomet, his message, and his mission. My respect and homage go forth even reverently to all the great ethical and religious teachers of history, to those spiritual and intellectual leaders of the race who, at times in agony and in martyrdom, have delivered messages of regeneration to mankind.

I make my respectful salute to Confucius and Buddha, the ethical teachers, in whose writings are found many passages of sublimity and beauty. I pay my deep homage and reverence to the Hebrew prophets and teachers, to Moses, to Abraham, to Isaac and Jacob and the tribes, to the gentle Hillel, and to Akiba. My reverence and adoration go up to Jesus of Nazareth, the most precious gem of human life, "the noblest blossom of a noble tree, the crown of the cedar of Israel." But I draw the line on Mahomet, the military conqueror and robber, the forger of oracles, the polygamist.

I have read the Koran through twice from beginning to end. I have also read several standard lives of Mahomet, among them those of Washington Irving, Higgins, Sale, and Gibbon. Furthermore, I have made it a point to read translations from the books of his own Turkish and Arabian biographers. I feel justified, then, in saying that I am pretty well acquainted with Mahomet and his teachings, and I trust that you will not think that I am guilty of too great digression if I now pay my respects to both Mahomet and his followers.

The declaration may sound bold and even unjustifiable to some of you, but I am prepared to assert that Mohammed stole all that is worthy in his religion from the Jews and Christians, that the finer passages of the Koran are taken almost bodily from the Bible, and that the followers of Mohammed overran and captured Palestine by military force. If these things be true, it comes in bad grace from the Arabs of Palestine or from their friends and apologists to lay claim either to the territory or the sacred places around Jerusalem. I respectfully submit that even a thousand years of political or historical prescription give no valid title to lands or places originally acquired by fraud and force.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that we Christians should encourage the reestablishment of the Jews in Palestine for selfish and sentimental reasons as well as from motives of gratitude and a sentiment of justice. We should rush to the assistance of the Jews in the matter of the Zionist movement as Lord Byron went to Greece to fight for the independence of the Greeks. We should speak in Congress with the same feelings and the same inspiration that caused him to write The Isles of Greece, feelings born of a love of freedom and of a passionate desire to preserve a civilization and a type.

No garden of flowers is perfect or complete without the presence of the rose and the orchid, of the violet and the lily, and, indeed, of every kind of flower of tenderness and beauty. Nor can the garden of life be perfect and complete without the presence and preservation of all the fine types of intellect and spirit that have come from the trials and sufferings, the struggles and sacrifices of the various peoples of our race. Civilization would certainly be made imperfect by the loss of any one of the great types, for its essential elements, after all, are but the component parts of a blending of the varying attributes and execellencies of all human life.

Rome gave laws, Greece gave letters, and Palestine gave religion to mankind. Thus runs the judgment of the world. We are interested in the preservation of all these colossal types, and especially those of the Hebrew and the Greek, and above all that of the Hebrew, for beyond the boundaries of kingdoms and above distinctions of creed or blood is a colossal universal spiritual type established by the Hebrew. This type reflects the sacred and spiritual in every human heart that looks above idols and beyond the stars; a type that ignores self and attributes every splendid, righteous act to the Author of all things; that spurns a self-development whose maker and molder is not God; that hears in rolling thunder the awful voice of Jehovah sending warnings to his children, and sees in lightning a manifestation of eternal wrath; a type that gave Pharisees to Judea, Stoics to Rome, and Puritans to England.

These latter characterizations suggest integral opposites somewhere—the needed complements of a perfect whole—and reflection at once begins to classify along lines of nature and of history, grouping Pharisees with Sadducees, Stoics with Epicureans, and Puritans with Cavaliers.

The essential complement of the Hebrew type was furnished by Greece, the first great rival of Judea in intellect and spirit. The civilizations of the earth circle around these names as smaller planets revolve around great central suns. The essential elements of opposing Hebrew and Hellenic growths are everywhere reflected in national and individual life.

In the organization of every man on earth two antagonistic forces are forever active—the heavenly and earthly, the spiritual and natural, the ascetic and voluptuous. If the spiritual predominates, the man is Hebrew in structure and temperament. If the sensuous and voluptuous are the controlling attributes, the man is Greek.

If in the solitude of deep forests he hears the rustle of the leaves as fleeing nymphs depart and sees in every tree and rock and stream the reflected image of some deity of nature; if, while standing on the famous battlefields of earth, he hears again the tread and tramp of embattled millions, feels again the sublime thrill and fierce rapture of a bayonet charge, hears again the brazen lips of hostile cannon thunder alternate anthems to the god of battles; if "with color, form, and music he is touched to tears", and while standing in the Vatican or Louvre feels within himself the thrilling power that corresponds to the magic force that painted a madonna or carved a marble god, then this man is a Greek of the age of Pericles, a figure from the antique world.

A full development of these attributes on a colossal scale and along collective lines stamps a nation's history with character and distinctive life, reflecting in the whole the characteristic traits of all component parts. To verify this thought, cast a glance across the pages of Hellenic history.

An old blind bard sings; the Iliad is born, and under the spell of the Homeric muse all the grace and grandeur of Grecian life blossom into perfect beauty.

A million Persians advance upon a mountain pass, 300 Lacedæmonians defend, and the chivalry of the ages has a standard and a metaphor in the death-devoted sacrifice of Leonidas and his band.

Ctesiphon moves the Greek Assembly to vote Demosthenes a golden crown in consideration of public services, the motion is illegal, Ctesiphon is accused, and at the trial of the indictment the oratorical prodigies of antiquity appear as combatants. Æschines is exiled, Demosthenes is apotheosized, and mankind receives the priceless legacy of the incomparable oration, "On the Crown."

Zeuxis and Parrhasius, as a trial of skill, paint two pictures. That of Zeuxis represents a bunch of grapes and is so perfectly executed that the birds come and pick at it. Flushed with pride and confident of success, Zeuxis calls upon his rival to draw aside the curtain which conceals his picture. But, lo! the curtain itself is the painting of Parrhasius, and Zeuxis is beaten, for he who has deceived the birds is himself deceived by his antagonist.

Phidias, Praxiteles, and other sculptors carve from cold and pulseless marble those forms of life and beauty that thrill the human soul with perfect joy, and the frieze of the Parthenon, the Apollo Belvedere, the Venus di Medici, the Venus de Milo become the perpetual heritage of a sensuous and beauty-loving world.

Marvelous and magnificent history this! And from alpha to omega how superbly Greek—every line and lineament stamped with Hellenic imprint! But how radically different all this from everything Judean! The accentuated antithesis of every chapter of Grecian history describes all the glories and splendors of Hebrew life.

The Greek relied upon himself and his javelin for safety and preservation in time of danger. The Hebrew placed his trust in God and believed that prayer would save him from all harm. In the temples of the Acropolis, in the pages of the Odyssey, in the victories of Marathon and Salamis, the Greek acknowledged the handiwork of man and dedicated monuments to those who had brought renown to Greece. The Hebrew ascribed to the omnipotence of Jehovah every grand and righteous act and covered with benedictions the prophet who had most completely revealed the will of Heaven. Every transcendent deed of righteousness was credited to the Lord of Hosts.

Yes; I repeat, that if all else be lost, mankind must preserve at any hazard both the Hebrew and Grecian types of intellect and spirit, for they are fundamental in our natures and are deeply interwoven in the very warp and woof of all that is grandly spiritual and superbly intellectual in our history, literature, and civilization. The loss of the spiritual and intellectual products of Greece and Palestine to civilization would cause mankind to relapse with frightful speed into savage and barbaric night.

The Greeks have Greece. Let us give Palestine back to the Jews.

Then will the prophecies of the Hebrew seers be fulfilled; then will justice be done; then will the demands of liberty, humanity, and civilization be satisfied; then, and only then, will Byron's muse be answered:

"OH! WEEP FOR THOSE

"Oh! weep for those that wept by Babel's stream,
Whose shrines are desolate, whose land a dream;
Weep for the harp of Judah's broken shell;
Mourn—where their God hath dwelt the godless dwell!

And where shall Israel lave her bleeding feet?
And when shall Zion's song again seem sweet?
And Judah's melody once more rejoice
The hearts that leap'd before its heavenly voice?

Tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast,
How shall ye flee away and be at rest!
The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave,
Mankind their country—Israel but the grave!"

"ON JORDAN'S BANKS

"On Jordan's banks the Arab's camels stray,
On Zion's hill the False One's votaries pray,
The Baal-adorer bows on Sinai's steep—
Yet there—even there—oh God! Thy thunders sleep.

There—where Thy finger scorch'd the tablet stone!
There—where Thy shadow to Thy people shone!
Thy glory shrouded in its garb of fire:
Thyself—none living see and not expire!

Oh! in the lightning let Thy glance appear;
Sweep from the shiver'd hand the oppressor's spear:
How long by tyrants shall Thy land be trod!
How long Thy temples worshipless, O God!"

PRESENTATION BY INDIANA DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION OF THE INDIANA BELL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD an address delivered on April 16, 1933, at Valley Forge, Pa., by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], at the dedication of the Indiana bell, a gift of the Indiana Daughters of the American Revolution as an addition to the Washington Memorial Chapel carillon.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

May I take this first opportunity to felicitate the Indiana Daughters of the American Revolution upon the completion of a great and patriotic service.

While the Indiana bell will be presented and dedicated this afternoon by officers and members of your organization, I am assuming now to speak in behalf of the entire citizenship of our beloved State, in giving voice to that gratitude and heart-felt appreciation which goes out to your patriotic organization from every Hoosier home for the contribution which you are this day making to the perpetuity and sanctity of this national shrine.

Although your patriotic activities and accomplishments have long been recognized throughout the State, none have been more in keeping with the origin and purposes than your procurement and gift of this Indiana bell. What a source of joy and gratification it will be to your officers and members to remember that down through the ages your bell, Indiana's bell, will join with those of all the sister States in daily and hourly tribute to the immortal Washington.

Although the quotation is quite familiar to the members of your patriotic organization, I repeat here the unparalleled estimate of Cyrus Townsend Brady in the hope that it may penetrate every Indiana home and bring to this place and occasion that deep reverence which they so richly deserve:

"No spot on earth, not the plains of Marathon, nor the passes of Sempach, nor the place of the Bastile, nor the dikes of Holland, nor the moors of England, is so sacred in the history of the struggle for human liberty as Valley Forge."

May I likewise felicitate you upon the selection of the Biblical admonition which you have so wisely chosen to inscribe upon the rim of this bell:

"Remove not the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set."

What a clarion call that is to this present-day, turbulent political world!

"Remove not the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set."

This generation has witnessed more widespread political, economic, and social changes than any other one generation in modern history. This is neither the time nor occasion to discuss the merits of such changes. I simply state it as an indisputable fact that more so-called strong and great nations have changed their forms of government and have adjusted their social, economic, and industrial systems to new and different standards during the past quarter of a century than during any similar period of time in this modern era.

The United States of America differs only in degree from many of her sister nations. The universally recognized depression under which we as a nation have been suffering for the past several years has, no doubt, provoked these changes in America. Every class and condition of our citizenship has been affected. In the industrial world millions of workers are out of employment. It has been estimated that more than 13,000,000 men are today tramping the streets of America in search of a job, and that each day adds to this army of unfortunates. Homes have been disrupted and the health and education of children have been retarded. Colossal industrial and economic enterprises have collapsed, carrying in their wake the accumulated fortunes of generations. Our basic industries, our farms and mines, have failed to yield returns over and above the cost of production, with resultant disaster not only to such fundamental industries but to all those economic superstructures dependent for their existence upon such industries.

As a result, our social, industrial, and economic relations are out of joint. In the midst of plenty, hunger and nakedness stalk through the land. Wealth there is in abundance, but it is in hiding and performs no service. Fear clutches at the hearts of our people. As a nation, we are being threatened with the loss of our morale.

It is quite palpable, even to the most casual observer, that America and her institutions are today undergoing some of the most radical changes and crucial tests since our inception as a nation. Will we, or will we not, survive?

Let me preface my brief observations here this afternoon with the statement that in my opinion the framework of our Government and the principles underlying it are sufficient to meet every political and economic exigency with which we are now, or may be, confronted in the future. I am not one of those who have lost faith in the smallest degree in the sufficiency of American government. But while making that statement I am not unmindful of the seriousness of the situation and the urgent necessity of prompt and intelligent attention to the demands of the hour. The welfare and perpetuity of our Nation today challenges the best thought and the most disinterested service of every patriotic American citizen. The Chief Executive at Washington and a Congress which, to a large extent, has abandoned partisan lines and dedicated its time and talents to the public service, are assuming their respective duties fearlessly and courageously.

But the rehabilitation of the American people demands more than Executive edicts and legislative enactments. It demands from all classes and conditions of our people the recognition and assumption of the full duties and responsibilities of American citizenship. Before the United States of America regains her former proud position of strength and vigor, every citizen will, in my opinion, be called upon for even greater sacrifices than those already rendered.

Out of this economic chaos a new industrial and economic order will arise. New limitations and restrictions will be placed upon business, capital, and labor. New vehicles will be created for greater social justice. Stronger safeguards will be thrown around the health and education of children. Provision will be made to protect the worker against the fear of penniless old age or long periods of unemployment. More equitable distribution of that wealth, which the Nation is so capable of producing, will flow naturally but certainly through the channels of the new industrial order.

Such changes as above set out cannot be brought about painlessly and without cooperation and sacrifices upon the part of all classes of our citizenship.

We have just witnessed congressional and Executive action which will result in the curtailment of pensions and the pay of Federal employees as a means of balancing the Budget, preserving the credit of the Nation, and forestalling national bankruptcy. If this were the end of the effort, it might, in many instances, be called cruel and unfair. In fact, it is only the beginning. Every other class of our citizenship must likewise make contribution, and in direct proportion to its ability to pay.

Sacrifice is one of the obligations incident to present-day American citizenship. Just as upon a foundation of sacrifice has the Nation been erected.

May I call your attention to one more illustration? For the purpose of spreading employment, it is quite evident that the work-week and the workday must be shortened. It is said that owing to the mechanization of modern industrial plants, even if such plants were to resume operations similar to their peak operations of 1928, there would still be a standing army of more than 2,000,000 idle workers—the victims of this modern automatic machine age. To adjust the operation of industrial plants to this new work schedule will involve sacrifice and loss to the owners and perhaps increased cost of commodities to the ultimate consumers. Shall we hesitate in the face of a condition which makes mendicants of millions of American workmen at the doors of public and private charities?

These are only suggestions as to what lies before the American public in the rebuilding of our economic, financial, and industrial systems, along lines which will forestall such another economic upheaval as that through which we are now passing. Are we brave enough and patriotic enough to assume such burden? Are we sufficiently interested in the preservation and perpetuity of our governmental structure to assume the sacrifices incident to the putting of our house in order, or shall we continue to drift, as others have done before us, into governmental and economic chaos?

It is my prayer and belief that the American people are both able and willing to meet the situation fearlessly and successfully.

Washington, in his Farewell Address, made this statement: "Citizens of a common country whether by birth or adoption, that country has the right to concentrate your affections."

What I am pleading for today is the concentration of the affections of all good, loyal American citizens upon our common country—such concentration as will build a new faith in America and American institutions, impatience with all attempts to malign or undermine the Government, and loyal cooperation with the Government in its efforts to regain our former material and spiritual leadership of the world. As suggested hereinbefore, Congress may legislate at will, the Chief Executive may enter daily and hourly Executive orders, but without the loyal support and cooperation of all our citizenship, such legislation and Executive decrees will avail but little.

I know of no more historic spot than Valley Forge, nor no more inspiring character than Washington from which to seek guidance and direction in this hour of extremity. If I have read the life work of the Father of our Country correctly, the one outstanding attribute of his public and private life was that of service. As engineer, farmer, and business man, he gave the full measure of his talents to the betterments of his community and his fellowmen. As leader of the Revolution, as a guiding spirit in the framing of the Constitution, and later as the first President of his country, he was animated alone by a passionate and disinterested love of his country.

Daniel Webster, speaking at the Centennial Celebration of the Birth of Washington, summarized his strength in these brief words:

"There was in the breast of Washington one sentiment so deeply felt, so constantly uppermost, that no proper occasion escaped without its utterance. From the letter which he signed in behalf of the convention when the Constitution was sent out to the people, to the moment when he put his hand to that last paper in which he addressed his countrymen, the Union—the Union—was the great object of his thoughts."

May we, as a people, gather faith and inspiration from the ideals and traditions of the fathers. And while thus pleading for love and loyalty and sacrifice to the Government in behalf of the citizens, may we insist with no less emphasis that the Government itself constantly take stock of its origin and ring true to the people.

The surrender at Yorktown was not the crucial hour in the American Republic. That hour came 6 years later at Philadelphia, when those victorious Colonies assembled in convention to develop a new ideal, a new government, in which the people might be the keeper of their own destinies. Happily for the world, wisdom and unselfishness ruled that assemblage, and its purpose was accomplished. That Government has proven the stubborn texture of its fabric. Under it we have grown from a little fringe of States along the Atlantic seaboard into a Nation which sweeps from sea to sea—a diversified and complex Nation, an irresistible and unconquerable Nation both in the ways of war and peace. We have succeeded because, in my opinion, we have kept the faith. Just now, in State and Federal Governments, we are engaged in what may appear to be serious departures from the ideals and traditions of the founders. If those in whom these unusual and unprecedented powers are vested should by the administration of such powers confirm the fears of those who today are just as jealous of the people's rights as were the founders of the Republic, then from that day will we mark the decadence of our treasured liberties. Never for one moment must our Government lose sight of its original purpose and design as the vehicle—and only the vehicle—for the preservation of the lives and liberties and the happiness of the American people. Thus only, through the love and loyalty of the citizen to his Government on the one hand, and the responsiveness and fidelity of the Government to the citizen on the other, will America reach the full measure of her destiny.

May our presence here this afternoon contribute to the preservation and future promise of the American Republic.

PHILOSOPHY OF NATIONAL DOMAINS—ADDRESS BY T. L. JEFFORDS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Honorable T. L. Jeffords, a distinguished jurist of West Virginia, before an educational conference in Jefferson County, W.Va., entitled "Philosophy of National Domains".

In view of the recent discussions in the Halls of Congress on the national and international situation, I am positive that this address will prove both interesting and instructive.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Looking at histories we do not find that any deal noticeably with national domains, but more generally with wars, customs, laws, policies, and people; but national domains would seem to be worth an attempt at writing a philosophy of some of them, and that is the purpose of this paper.

Horace Greeley said, "Young man, go west and grow up with the country", and man and civilization have always been going west.

Someone has said the average American citizen might have some hesitation about going to heaven unless he were assured of an opportunity to go farther west.

Ever since the flood humankind has been moving west, and has gone so far west it may soon arrive all the way around the circle to where the ark rested.

Most of the world development has been by water, and the large cities of the world are located on or near the water, and the population in cities is increasing while that outside the cities is decreasing.

Those who have read about the development of our West may recall that some pioneer settlers insisted that wealth came not from digging gold but from digging the soil, that real progress was not made in prospecting but in ploughing.

Great Britain is an example of greatness by acquiring more territory, and has larger national domain than any other country, and the innate desire to go farther west may be one reason for it.

Already there is no place for the citizen of the United States to go farther west, and the urge to do that must remain unsatisfied unless there be found some place to go; and where shall it be found?

The United States is now in the most severe and lasting depression any man living has ever known, and we are told that for the past year or two more foreigners have been leaving the United States than have been coming into it, and during that period more citizens of the United States have been leaving and remaining away, some expatriating themselves, than at any other time. Is this due to the depression or to the ambition to go farther west, or both, or other causes?

The natural human tendency to go farther west has been manifested by the Britisher in also going farther north, south, and east, and to do this it was necessary to travel on the water, and as a result of that necessity, Great Britain has the largest and most powerful navy and merchant marine the world has ever known.

Great Britain has acquired and developed so much land area, national domain, in so many directions and such distances away from home and away from each other that the enlargement of its navy and merchant marine has followed as a natural result.

Possessing and having control of all this land area and its people and resources, it has developed its navy and merchant marine in acquiring and developing land area, and there would seem to be no good reason why this reciprocal development will not continue, but how long and to what extent?

Japan conditions lately and now suggest a comparison of that country with Great Britain and a perhaps more than possible development of Japan along the same lines as Great Britain, which has enlarged its possessions across more water than Japan is obliged to travel to enlarge its possessions.

The home domain of Japan is small, like the Great Britain home domain, is located in the Pacific somewhat like the location of England in the Atlantic—and will Japan develop along the line Great Britain has and become as much more powerful than Great Britain as the Pacific Ocean is larger than the Atlantic Ocean?

In the United States there are about 4 persons to every square mile, while in Japan there are about 400, and it would seem that the time for Japan to enlarge, go west, is perhaps overripe.

Notwithstanding the League of Nations, the points of international debate, treaties, open and secret, parleys, conferences, assemblies, negotiations, pacts, and the World Court, it would seem now reasonably certain that Japan will not give up any part of its lately acquired possession of what was formerly part of China, and it would seem equally certain that Japan has embarked on a campaign of development and acquisitions of territory which is not likely to be stopped for some time, and will continue until Japan becomes a world power. There is no doubt that throughout the world there is much unrest, and perhaps more now generally than at any other time, and is this because of a lack of opportunity or expression of eagerness to satisfy that ambition to go farther west?

Japan some years ago began warlike operations somewhat like those in which it is now engaged, but ostensibly directed against Russia, and it has been said that the Portsmouth Treaty, which terminated that war, was one of the great drawbacks in the development of modern times, and further that the treaty was not really a peace treaty, but the terms of it were dictated by a large banking house in New York City and were prerequisite to making a large loan of money abroad.

And the theory on which it is asserted that this so-called "peace treaty" was a drawback is that if it had not been made, the war between Japan and Russia would probably have lasted years, and during that period Russia would have been opened to the world and to visitation by war correspondents, photographers, investors, promoters, solicitors, and the like, and that conditions in Russia would not now be what they are, but would be more like conditions in other countries.

And in this same connection there are those of philosophic turn of mind who feel that the too early ending of that war is showing results in the beginning of the present war, and that in a sense the present war against China is but a continuation of the earlier war against Russia, the purpose of both being to acquire more territory; and if so, that leads to more thought and study of this question of national domain.

If Japan continues this war and enlarges its territory, it will be necessary for her to enlarge her navy and merchant marine, and this reciprocal development of Japan may continue along the same line as that of Great Britain; and if so, why will not these two countries divide the mastery of the waters—and will a time come when the two will war for the supremacy which Great Britain now has?

The United States is the best part of North America because it has the best climate, for it is too cold in that part north of the United States and too warm in that part south of the United States for either to have an ideal development, production, or population.

And because of climatic conditions the larger part of South America will not have an ideal development, production, or population, and this results in the United States of America being the greatest national power of the Western Hemisphere.

But what line of development may be desired or expected that will give the citizens of the United States an opportunity to express this desire to go farther west? Will acquiring or annexing all between the United States and South America give the United States citizen an overflow chance? Has the purchase of Alaska helped to satisfy that inclination to go farther west? Is it because of no opportunity to satisfy this inclination that foreigners and citizens of the United States are leaving it?

Colonel Lindbergh made a neighborly good-will trip to South America, and perhaps the significance of it has been overlooked, but he made a far more significant trip when he went north through Alaska into Siberia.

Will the time come when we shall have railroad routes or air routes from South America through North America into Siberia and on to China, Japan, India, Europe, and Africa? Will the Valley of the Nile again become a great producing area? Will a development drive into Russia so as to give the world more benefit of its resources? Will India be changed to a condition so desirable that it will be as attractive as it seemed when Alexander the Great took his army there? Will the Orient come back to a former condition when it produced such men as the Wise Men of the East, Hammurapi, Zoroaster, and Omar Khayyam; and will these what some may now call backward or laggard countries be so changed that in what is now China there will again be men like Confucius, and will the present Japanese war help bring about all or part of this?

It is said that progress is founded on the blood and bones of those who have suffered and sacrificed, and that a history of the world is a history of its wars. Is it philosophical now to expect progress to come or to be built on peace, or, as in the past, on suffering, sacrifices, and blood; in other words, on wars?

Oriental civilization flourished, Chinese, Indian, Persian, Chaldean, Babylonian, Jewish, Greek, Egyptian, Roman, each one farther west, and now we think there are numerous civilizations that flourish, but will they be transitory or lasting, and what of the United States?

Do development and progress mean only going west until we begin again to go east and going round and round, and are world development and progress that in which events and existences follow in a circle?

Not so many years ago the Indians were in possession of North America, or at least that part of it which is the United States, and now there are comparatively few Indians within that area. Will the invasion and war of the Japanese in China continue until the condition and number of the Chinese in China are like the condition and number of the Indians in the United States?

Has destroying the Indians and taking their lands been progress or not; has the change come by treaty, by peace, or by wars for more domain, and what is the philosophy of national domains?

China, India, Russia, Africa, and the Pacific Ocean hold opportunities to exercise the universal desire to go farther west.

Conditions portend more revolutions and more wars.

6-HOUR DAY, 30-HOUR WEEK

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, on yesterday, at the instance of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], there was read into the RECORD a letter from Toledo, Ohio, to the effect that three manufacturing concerns of that city had threatened their employees in connection with securing signatures to petitions in opposition to the 30-hour week bill. I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram, signed by those three concerns, which I have received this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

TOLEDO, OHIO, April 18, 1933.

Hon. R. J. BULKLEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Associated Press carries story that Senator BLACK today read into Senate RECORD anonymous letter to effect Electric Autolite Co., Logan Gear Co., and Bingham Stamping Co., of Toledo, had threatened their employees with dismissal if they did not oppose so-called "30-hour week" bill. Will appreciate it very much if you will see that in same RECORD is written statement that this is absolutely false; that no employee has been so threatened.

THE ELECTRIC AUTOLITE CO.
LOGAN GEAR CO.
BINGHAM STAMPING CO.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, in all fairness I should say that the letter which was read into the RECORD yesterday was not an anonymous letter. The writer requested, for obvious reasons, that his name should not be disclosed, and the Senator from Alabama properly respected that confidence. On the other hand, I think the correspondent who wrote the letter must have been mistaken in the assertions that he made because it seems to me likely that if these concerns had gone to the length of threatening employees to secure signatures in opposition to the passage of the 30-hour-week bill, in all probability I would have received some such petition. I have not received or seen any.

Of the three concerns signing the telegram, I have heard directly from only one in opposition to the 30-hour bill. The other two did not even take the trouble to communicate with me directly to voice their opposition to the bill. I consequently believe that the charge that they have intimidated employees is not well founded. If there is any evidence that there has been any intimidation in the State of Ohio I should like to have it, because I believe there is nothing more contemptible than an attempt on the part of employers to influence by threats any voting or political expression of opinion on the part of their employees.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state in connection with the letter that the only information I had relative to it was contained in the letter itself, which was read. It was in line, however, with letters which I have received from various parts of the United States. In order that the illustration may be properly given, I send to the desk now a letter from Lancaster, S.C. At the end of the letter is the request, "Please do not let anyone see this—my name." The name is signed to the letter. It is exactly the same kind of letter I have received from various people throughout the United States. In this connection I should like to have the letter read without disclosing the name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

LANCASTER, S.C., April 17, 1933.

United States Senator HUGO L. BLACK,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The cotton manufacturers are trying to defeat your 6-hour a day and 30-hour a week law by every kind and conceivable false propaganda under the sun. I heard of a plan now to get the operatives to sign a petition asking Congress not to pass your bill. They can get the operatives to sign anything at this time, because the operatives are afraid of losing their jobs, and the cotton manufacturers are trying to scare the operatives in regard to your bill with starvation wages. This law of yours is the greatest piece of legislation now before Congress and should be pushed on at once to a successful conclusion. Your 6-hour a day law is the best law, too, for the manufacturers. When your bill becomes a law, here is what will take place: Production will be curtailed 25 or more percent; inside of 3 months there will be a shortage of cotton goods; therefore the price of goods will advance, wages will advance, and there will be a demand for labor.

Your bill is the only thing that will combat this machine age. Improved high-speed machines have thrown half the cotton-mill operatives out of work. Operatives are operating three times as many machines as they operated 4 years ago, and the operative who made $20 a week 4 years ago is making $8 now.

The laboring people of the country are in a bad plight; they cannot make complaint to their superiors for fear of losing their job, and they are working 12 hours a day besides. Unless Congress comes to our relief, may the great God have mercy on us.

Please keep up your good work for us, and our prayer is that your life may be greatly blessed and may every success come to you.

Please don't let anyone see this—my name.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, of course the subject matter of the letter from South Carolina has nothing to do with the subject matter I brought up this morning. I have expressed no opinion as to whether there may be intimidation of employees in South Carolina or elsewhere. I have seen no evidence of intimidation in the State of Ohio in connection with this particular legislation. In fairness to the three companies in Toledo who were charged with intimidation, I have been glad to place their denial in the RECORD.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that I think it is a very bad practice to offer a letter for the RECORD, at the same time withholding the name of the author. It is not fair to the Senate, it is not fair to the public, and it is extremely unfair to those against whom charges are made. I desire to say that hereafter, if request is made to have a letter go in the RECORD, I shall object to it unless the author's name is disclosed and accompanies the charge.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I simply desire to state that in offering the first letter I made the specific statement that the writer had requested that his name be not published. The Senator from Oregon, of course, had a right to object then. Feeling as he does, I think he should object whenever such letters are offered in the future. I shall be very glad, however, to permit the Senator from Oregon or any other Senator, because I know that no Senator would expose a writer's name where it might do injury, to see the letter in question or any other of the numerous letters on this subject I have in my files from employees throughout the United States.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to address a further question to the Senator from Colorado in respect to his sugar amendment. I call his attention to the fact that on page 15 of the bill the provisions of this proposed act do not apply to certain possessions of the United States, and I am wondering whether that invites a free sugar competition from our insular possessions, which would make his amendment represent a handicap rather than an advantage to the American production?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Does the Senator refer to subdivision (f) on page 15?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I also ask whether the Senator's question relates to the bill as a whole or to the proposed amendment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am asking particularly respecting the Senator's amendment, because if Philippine sugar is free of the increased processing tax, manifestly a disadvantage would have been created against the continental situation by the Senator's amendment. It is the first time the point has come up. I think it would also apply to rice. I think it might be a very serious matter in respect to rice. I am wondering if the Senator has given any consideration to that point in respect to sugar.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I say in answer to the Senator from Michigan that it has been my assumption that the processing tax would apply to imported sugar, even from the Philippine Islands. If there is any doubt on that question it should be corrected by an amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As the Senator reads subsection (f), does he not think that his assumption was without foundation?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There may be a point in the Senator's suggestion, though it has not impressed me.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it not also apply to competition that exists between vegetable oil from our insular possessions and domestic dairy by-products?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly, if covered by the bill; and such a variance would cause a disadvantage to the domestic industry which ought to be clearly obviated. In other words, it was my view last night—and further examination of the statute has confirmed the impression—that it is not accurate to speak of any tax imposed in this bill as in the nature of a tariff. The evident purpose of the bill is to place the imported article and the domestic article on a parity. That purpose ought to be maintained. I assume that it has been maintained.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] for his interpretation of the situation we are now discussing? It is a new point that has been raised. Would it not apply to rice? Would it not apply to vegetable oils? Would it not create a differential or disadvantage to the American producer at each point where a Philippine commodity enters either by way of direct or substitute competition?

Mr. SMITH. Unless the same rule applied to the Philippine production that does to American production, it seems to me it would act to the advantage of the Philippine producer rather than the American producer.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the Senator's interpretation of subsection (f), at the top of page 15? Are not the Philippine Islands entirely exempted, in respect of all products, from any phase of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. I think that is unquestionably true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, should not the Philippine Islands at least be removed from this list of exemptions? Why should any territory under the American flag be exempted? Why should we not all live under a common rule?

Mr. SMITH. That is a matter which will have to be decided by the Senate. Of course, the Senator recognizes that the committee had the bill for a considerable time, but that feature of it was not discussed as far as I recollect. I do not think that feature was discussed in the committee at all. But if we allow importations from those islands to come in as of now and then put a processing tax on the things produced here, of course, it is obvious to all that the advantage would be with importations from those islands.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest to the Senator from Coloradio that it would scarcely seem wise to vote upon his amendment until we can have some assurance that the back door is not going to be open after we have adopted his amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I agree with the Senator from Michigan that it would appear under this language that competition in any of the excepted territory would be stimulated to the disadvantage of American industry. I took occasion last night to confer with the office of the legislative counsel on this subject. Their view, like mine, was to the effect that the processing tax in any event would apply to the imported article. If that is not true, then in my judgment this subdivision should be stricken.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The processing tax certainly is one of the "provisions of this title", reading from the exemptions in subsection (f).

Mr. COSTIGAN. The real purpose of the exception, I think, was doubtless to guard the duty-free imports from the Philippine Islands. In line with what I stated in answer to the first question of the Senator from Michigan, duty-free imports are not interfered with by the bill because the processing tax is a domestic tax. It is not a tariff. It is an excise tax applicable to all articles enumerated as basic which are sold in the United States, produced or imported. It seems to me appropriate to consider further whether this subdivision should be stricken.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Michigan has raised a very important question, but I invite his attention to subdivision (e) of section 15, found on page 21, particularly lines 7, 8, and 9. Will not the Senator see if that does not cover the situation?

I also direct the inquiry to the chairman of the committee. I think that the compensating tax on articles produced in the possessions would put them on a parity with the domestically produced commodities and prevent the harm and disadvantage to which the Senator from Michigan a moment ago directed our attention.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask the able Senator from Oregon to read subsection (e) on page 21 in conjunction with subsection (f) at the top of page 15. Subsection (e) is a part of the same title as subsection (f), and subsection (f) says that "the provisions of this title shall be applicable to the United States and its possessions, except the Philippine Islands", and so forth.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I have read that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does not that take subsection (e) on page 21 out of application to the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and so forth?

Mr. McNARY. No; I believe not.

Mr. SMITH. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in lines 4 and 5 it is provided that the processing tax shall be "paid upon any article processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value of such commodity and imported into the United States or any possession thereof to which this title applies", and so forth. Now this title does not apply to subsection (f) because it is eliminated. Therefore the title cannot apply to it. It is specifically eliminated. It does apply to all that are not specifically exempted, so that we have a confusion here in the two sections.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think the confusion is as great as indicated by the distinguished Senator from Michigan and the able Senator from South Carolina. Subsection (f), on page 15, says that provision shall be applicable to the United States and its possessions and then eliminates or excepts several possessions. That is true; but on page 21, where the compensating tax is mentioned, it includes products in foreign countries and in our possessions, and makes those products when brought into the United States subject to the same tax as products domestically produced. I think there can be no confusion about that matter.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then it would be the interpretation of the Senator from Oregon, for example, that if beet sugar and cane sugar were included in the basic commodities, then equivalent processed commodities from the Philippine Islands would have to pay the compensating tax defined on page 21?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. If not, it should be made definite and certain, because it would be a very distinct advantage to permit the introduction and importation of such products into this country in competition with those who have to pay this tax.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator this question: If we put this tax on the importation of Philippine commodities without granting them the same benefits that accrue to the producers here, we have penalized them, in contravention of our understanding with the Philippine Islands. If we tax them equal to the tax here for the benefit of the sugar grower, we are putting on a tariff directly in favor of the American producer.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct. I interpret the remarks of the Senator from Oregon to mean that we take all the benefit and give none under the terms of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. That is exactly true.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I want to say in reply to the statement made by the Senator from Michigan that a reading of subsection (e) on page 21 does not convince me at all that it would apply to the Philippine Islands. A reading of subsection (e) on page 21 seems to me to demonstrate that it is for the purpose of taking care of importations that may come from any country, and then to be sure that importations which come through the American possessions shall also be subject to the processing tax it is provided that such importations as may come from those possessions, the Philippines and other possessions, shall pay a compensating tax. But that does not conflict with the other subsection on page 15, which provides that the Philippine Islands shall not be included. Subsection (e) takes care of the question of importations from any country.

In view of the fact that we have applied the processing tax to the Philippines, it is provided that the compensating tax shall not apply to commodities imported from the Philippines. As I take it, that means that products that may be carried into the Philippines and processed in the Philippines would then be subject to this tax. But it still does not in terms reach out and take in the commodities that are the production of the Philippine Islands. My idea of it is that, construing the two paragraphs together, the Philippine products can come in absolutely free of any process requirements.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, we are assured by the authors of the bill that that is not contemplated. I suppose, for the time being, we shall have to rest upon that assurance; and then, in the course of the day, it seems to me that the apparent discrepancy between subsection (f), on page 15, and subsection (e), on page 21, should be very definitely made plain in respect to the interpretation that has been given us by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. At the bottom of page 10, in section 9, subsection (a), lines 23, 24, and 25, the bill reads:

> The processing tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the first domestic processing of the commodity, whether of domestic production or imported, and shall be paid by the processor.

I think that would include importations from our own possessions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My point is that the language at the top of page 15 is a general exemption in respect to the entire balance of the title.

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And that general exemption includes the Philippine Islands. Now, it is claimed that the language on page 21, by a process of tortuous interpretation, which I hope may not require us to fall back on some of the Department of Agriculture's "hogarithms", clears up the situation. Certainly, there must be no doubt left upon the subject.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, to my mind it is perfectly clear that the provision on page 15, unless there is some amendatory action taken, exempts the Philippine Islands and the islands enumerated in that section from the operation of the tax that will apply on all importations from foreign countries. It cannot be any plainer than it is; and, the subsequent section on page 21 to the contrary notwithstanding, it only provides in general terms for importation, and includes possessions; but we have exempted by specific language certain possessions of the United States that shall not pay the tax. Then we come to the difficulty that if they do pay it, it is tantamount to putting a tariff on the importations from these islands, unless we provide that the producers of these commodities shall receive the same benefit for paying the tax that the domestic producer does.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on fuller consideration I think it proper to say to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that as I now read the bill, subdivision (f), on page 15, exempts from the processing tax the Philippine Islands. It does not, however, if I understand the bill, exempt imported sugar from the provisions of subdivision (e) on page 21, because, as stated on line 8, "this title does not apply."

If the able Senator from South Carolina will further examine the bill, he will doubtless be satisfied that it is unnecessary, in order to give parity to domestic and imported sugar, to change the bill, because a compensating tax equivalent to the processing tax will be levied under the last-mentioned provision. The difference under the bill between the Philippine Islands and excepted possessions of the United States and the continental United States is with reference to increased benefit payments. These apparently are to be made only within the United States as defined. That, however, is not unusual, because we are frequently under the necessity to appropriate revenues to meet limited needs. The question before us is whether we are discriminating between Philippine imports and domestically produced commodities. That we are not doing, if I correctly read the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Let me understand clearly the point the Senator from Colorado is making—that the processing tax which shall be levied and collected for the benefit of the sugar producers in continental America shall not be applied to the Philippine Islands, but the commodity that is imported from the Philippine Islands to America shall pay the compensating tax?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is my interpretation of the bill as it is now drafted.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, that interpretation, of course, is in accord with the text; but the point I was making was that we would then in effect put a tariff duty on the importations from the Philippines to protect the advanced price of American sugar. Of course, if it seems that that could be the interpretation made here, it would be tantamount to levying a tariff against importations from the Philippines to measure the processing tax that we apply.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, my view of the subject differs from that of the able Senator; and apparently he did not understand the construction I was attempting to give the bill. It is my understanding that a compensating tax would be placed upon the imported sugar equal to, and not exceeding, the processing tax imposed on the domestic sugar. The articles would continue to come in from the Philippine Islands duty free. The purpose of the compensating tax would be to equalize and not do more than equalize the processing tax in the United States. The sugars, imported and domestic, would reach the market on a parity. If so, it is not fair to speak of the tax as a tariff hindering imports of Philippine sugar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not believe it is sound policy to include sugarcane as a basic commodity in this bill. I do not believe that sugarcane bears that relationship to the subject matter of the legislation; and it is readily conceivable, if we recognize sugarcane as a basic commodity, that many other commodities will enjoy the same right of recognition.

I repeat, while this amendment comes from my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], who is in favor of the bill, most of the proposals of this character come from those who avow themselves in opposition to it; and if the friends of the bill are going to permit an indefinite number of commodities to be defined as basic commodities, then the measure will become impossible of administration.

What is the meaning of the term "basic commodity"? I take it that the expression "basic" carries its own significance. It means fundamental, primarily essential as a part of the agricultural industry. While of course in one sense every agricultural commodity that the country produces is necessary, still I do not believe that this commodity ought to be incorporated; and if it is incorporated I think we are inviting a flood of amendments here, and an increase in the number of basic commodities.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask what effect it would have on the present tariff on sugar if this amendment should be adopted?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is a subject that has been discussed. Some have expressed the opinion that it would result in unfair discrimination against domestic producers. Others have expressed the very contrary opinion. I do not know; and that is another reason for not including this as a commodity.

Mr. BLACK. Under the terms of the bill, does it not require, if sugar shall be included, an additional imposition?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is a question that has been discussed some 30 minutes, and no conclusion has been reached about it.

Mr. BLACK. I was not here during the discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. One very able lawyer has maintained that a compensatory tax must be levied against sugar imported from certain possessions of the United States, including the Philippines, under the terms of this bill. Other Senators have taken directly the contrary view.

Mr. BLACK. What about sugar imported from other than the possessions of this country?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They would have to pay the tax.

Mr. BLACK. They would have to pay an additional compensatory tax, over and above the tariff that we have at the present time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had intended to participate further in the debate; but we have now progressed so far that we have commenced what was done in the committee—the pastime of putting a lot of other basic commodities in this bill.

I have not any doubt but that all of us are acting in the best of faith. I never saw a committee more anxious to solve a difficult problem as nearly as they could solve it than were the Agricultural Committee when they were considering this bill.

I think it must be admitted that if we put every agricultural product in this bill, we shall make a farce of it. It is going to be difficult to administer under any conditions. There is doubt even as to whether, under the very best of conditions, it can be made to work. It seems to me that we must admit that it is an experiment. It is one that I think we are justified in making. However wise anyone may pretend to be, I do not believe anybody can tell in advance just how it is going to work out. We are justified in passing such legislation only under the most desperate conditions, and such conditions, I think it is admitted by all, prevail now in our country and perhaps in the whole world. I have believed from the beginning that we ought to confine the basic agricultural products to just as few in number as possible. I thought that if we confined the basic products to wheat and cotton, we would by that means cover practically the entire country, and would enable the Department to carry out the law, and if it succeeded—and we all hope that the Department will succeed in the administration of it—if we wanted to later, we could extend it to other crops.

One reason why we ought to confine the bill is the very nature of the different kinds of commodities. It seems to me that it will be impossible to apply the law to some of them and make it work. The uncertainties, the ramifications would make it exceedingly difficult.

I wanted to strike out hogs and corn, although they are the main products of my State and my section of the country. It seemed to me that we could try the law best on two dominating, Nation-wide agricultural products. If we succeeded in raising the price of wheat, naturally the prices of all other agricultural products of a food nature would follow. The prices of them would come up automatically. There are reasons why it should apply to wheat and cotton. They are both produced in this country very much in excess of what we can consume, and we always have bothersome and troublesome surpluses on our hands. One of the things that has bothered us, that has stood in the way of any successful legislation on the agricultural question, has been the question of the surpluses.

In the last Congress we voted to strike everything out of a similar bill except wheat and cotton, and I think we were right in that. When the committee had referred to it the pending bill, it contained some things which it seemed to me ought to be left out. I see no reason why we should put rice in, for instance. I want to take out hogs and corn, although if we raise the price of one of those products, it will have a direct influence on the price of the other. The Secretary of Agriculture, in a conference I had with him about taking out corn and hogs, expressed the belief that it would work as to corn and hogs, and that he wanted those items left in the bill. He did not want to go any farther. He thought there might be ways under the law by which he could apply the law to hogs and corn.

I can see that as to hogs, for instance, there would be an opportunity of doing some good. At least, it is worthy of trial, and I understand serious consideration is now being given to a provision in the bill which would permit the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into contracts with processors without the levying of the processing tax, and put the proposed law into operation.

I can conceive how a contract might be made with the large packers by which they would agree, for instance, to pay 6 cents a pound for hogs. There is a provision in the bill for reaching such an agreement. If enough of them went into it to accomplish that, I should like to give them an opportunity to try it, to see whether that would not automatically raise the price of hogs, because all other buyers would have to meet the price that was made and offered by those who had entered into the agreement. If a sufficient number entered into it, I am rather inclined to think it would work. So that is a provision in the bill which might operate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement just made by the able Senator, that the question is being considered now of making contracts directly with the packers or others for the purpose of avoiding the imposition of the tax, does not the Senator believe that that, however, would be a condonation or ratification of the efforts which will be made to violate the Sherman antitrust law? It would seem to me that the processors having a contract with the Government that they were to do certain things could then justify claim, and certainly could under the provisions of the law, that they could enter into a combination to increase prices, and lift them so high as to be extortionate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I frankly concede that unless it were properly handled there would be evil in it; but this contract would be, in effect, a contract with the Government of the United States. If sufficient numbers of packers of meats entered into such a contract with the Government of the United States, and carried out the contract, which I think we will all have to concede the Secretary would be honest in making, all others would have to pay the price agreed on. The Secretary would not make a contract that was unreasonable, but if he wanted to raise the price of hogs to 5 or 6 cents a pound, and he entered into a contract with those who bought the hogs for slaughter and succeeded in making a contract with enough packers to do that, and they carried out the agreement, everybody else would have to pay the same price for hogs in order to get them.

There possibly ought to be a provision in the bill—and I have been told such an amendment is to be offered—which would provide that any corporation or individual entering into such a contract with the Government would be exempt from the operation of the antitrust law. If it were wide open, and they were permitted to enter into any kind of a contract, then the danger which the Senator from Utah points out would be apparent. But this contract is to be made with the Government of the United States. We will have to have faith enough and confidence enough in the Government of the United States to believe that it would not make a contract that would be unjust. Provision is in the bill now for the making of such a contract. I do not know whether such a contract can be brought about. If it could be, I think it would be a very important benefit to agriculture.

Mr. President, what I am relating is the result of a talk I had with the Secretary of Agriculture in my office. There was no secret about it, however. There was nothing covered up about it, so that he cannot have any objection to my stating what I have stated. It will be a perfectly honorable thing to do if the law shall be passed, and it will be a perfectly legal thing to do. That probably explains why we ought to leave such a thing as hogs in the bill. At least after the Secretary assured me that he wanted corn and hogs in the bill, and thought he might be able to do something with one or both of those commodities, I withdrew my objection, as far as I had any, to the inclusion of hogs and corn.

Mr. President, we had in the committee this situation. We put in this article, we put in that article, we put in the other article, we got a lot of them in, and we were not through putting them in. I think we had flax in. We were about to put beans in. We had peanuts in already. It became apparent to all of us that our bill was going to be a farce if we put everything in, that it was going to be unworkable. While the Secretary would not be compelled to take action on all the different commodities, nevertheless he would be under such pressure from all over the United States, from the producers of all kinds of farm products, to apply the law to them, that it would be irresistible, and I think the committee saw where we were going. So we took out all except those which were in when the bill came to the Senate, and I think we ought to have taken some of those out.

Now we have put in peanuts. I am not one who wants to ridicule that item. A great many people think of peanuts with the idea of ridicule, and that will have some psychological effect to the detriment of this proposed law if peanuts are left in. But I am not one who ridicules peanuts. A careful study of the peanut industry, I think, will convince anybody that in rather large sections of our country that is the principal agricultural product. It is a good agricultural product. It is one of the finest food products produced. I do not want to belittle it, and I am not trying to do that. But we put that item in.

Now come proposals to put in sugar beets and sugarcane. Do Senators know what will happen if we put those in? Will not the flax men make an effort to put flax in? Why would we not put flax in? Will not the beans men have a proposition to add beans? Will not the cattle and sheep men also demand that those products come in? They are out now. Will not a lot of other products be put in? What is the justification for voting against one and voting for another of these various products?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The gifted Senator from Nebraska represents one of the large sugar-beet-raising States of the country. I desire to ask him whether he is not concerned over reports in the press, one of which appears this morning, another of which I placed in the RECORD yesterday, indicating that there is an elaborate plan on foot to limit the production of sugar, both here and in Cuba, and through the marketing provisions of the law change the relations of sugar producers; also whether, if he is concerned, he does not think it desirable that a commodity subject to such a program should have assured to the growers the return of the moderate price, as in the case of other commodities, which prevailed in the years from 1914 to 1919?

If I may further interrupt, will the Senator be good enough in this connection to discuss the provisions for marketing found in subdivision 2, on page 7 of the bill, which apparently are made applicable to any agricultural commodity or product thereof?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not happen to have a copy of the bill before me. I had not intended to discuss any particular provision of the measure. That was not the purpose of my remarks. To begin with, when it comes to sugar and its price and a general knowledge of the subject of its production, I take my hat off to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. In my State there is a large quantity of sugar produced. The Senator from Colorado for many years was a member of the Tariff Commission.

In my judgment—and I say this without looking at him, and I hope he will not hear it—he was one of the best members the Tariff Commission ever had. He has made an intimate study not only of sugar but of a great many other things. I dislike more to disagree with the Senator from Colorado on the question of sugar than I would with any other Senator, because of the respect I have for his opinion, formed after many years of intelligent study of the question; but if his amendment should be put into the bill I do not believe the Secretary of Agriculture would apply it to sugar beets and sugarcane. I do not want to "pass that buck" to the Secretary; I want to take some of the responsibility myself; I want to relieve him of it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I have been very much interested in the Senator's remarks about basic commodities being included in this bill, and I should like to ask him on what principle the committee arrived at these basic commodities? In other words, on what principle rice was included and peanuts and sugar excluded, or on what principle hogs were included and cattle and sheep excluded? Of course, I am opposed to the bill; I think it is bad in principle, and my own notion is that it is going to prove another Farm Board fiasco, and in an exaggerated degree, but the principle on which I have been acting in this matter was to vote to allow any commodity to be included that wanted to be included and any commodity to be excluded that desired to be excluded. I should like to know on what principle the committee acted in making up the list of basic commodities?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in my humble judgment, in putting in rice, for instance, I do not think the committee acted on any principle; it was merely arbitrary. No matter what we put in, it is more or less arbitrary; I realize that. If the bill should be confined to the basic products of wheat and cotton, that would be an arbitrary decision. I concede that. I am acting and voting all the time on the theory that we are justified in making an experiment to meet a desperate situation. Cattle and sheep were excluded by vote of the committee. As I felt then, I would have voted to exclude everything except wheat and cotton. There was only one reason that moved me in that regard, and that was I wanted to confine the measure to as narrow a limit as I could, and I thought those two commodities covered the entire country. Whether that reason is good or not, it was my reason, and that is the way I looked at it.

Mr. CLARK. I can see the reason for trying an experiment, which this whole proposal frankly is, with two basic commodities, wheat and cotton; but when we begin to go beyond that and take in this commodity and that commodity, it seems to be an absolutely arbitrary determination. Where should the line be drawn? In other words, why did the committee include rice and not include sugar; why did they include hogs and not include sheep and cattle, except on the principle that the producers of some commodities wanted them included and others desired their commodities to be excluded?

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. Let me first answer the Senator from Missouri; indeed, I had not finished answering the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado when I was interrupted.

Mr. CLARK. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not objecting to interruptions, because I am not seeking anything except to try to get, from my viewpoint, a bill that will be as nearly practicable as possible. I shall yield to the Senator from Wyoming a little later if he will permit me to go on.

Mr. KENDRICK. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think rice ought to be included in the bill, and I will vote to strike it out. I think it never ought to have been put in. I realize the importance of the rice industry; I do not want anybody to get the idea that I think it is small and that it is not worthy of consideration; but we are starting out on a vast program, moved to do so by the terribly desperate condition in which we find agriculture. We want to do something; it may be that we shall fail; we must realize that, to begin with. However, I had rather go down fighting, Mr. President, to save the country and to save agriculture than to go down with my hands folded; and that is the only excuse I have for supporting this bill.

Those who are going to enforce the bill, in my judgment, are moved by the best of faith. They realize their difficulty, and I think we add to the difficulty when we multiply the commodities to which the provisions of the bill are to be applied.

Suppose we should raise the price of wheat by enacting this bill; suppose we should raise the price of cotton by doing so; does not everybody know that the price of corn and hogs and cattle and sheep and flax and every other farm product would automatically go up in sympathy with the incerase in the price of these two principal nation-wide commodities? My argument may not be good; it may not appeal to the Senate; but it is the thing that appeals to me. I am against loading this bill down. I should like to reconsider the vote by which peanuts were included in the bill, and take them out.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am in entire accord with the Senator from Nebraska in the matter of trying this experiment with respect to basic commodities, but when it is proposed to go beyond cotton and wheat, where are we going to stop?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the question; I admit that; I am trying to stop the Senate from going any further.

Now, I wish to say if we vote, for instance, to put sugar beets and sugarcane in the bill, I do not see any argument against putting in flax or beans or restoring cattle and sheep.

There were some peculiar reasons in the case of cattle and sheep. I want to say frankly they did not appeal to me very much, but the sheepmen and the cattlemen were almost unanimous in trying to keep cattle and sheep out of the bill; and, like the Senator from Missouri, I did not want to put any commodity in the producers of which wanted to be kept out. So I was very glad that they wanted to keep sheep and cattle out, and I wanted to relieve them. That may not be logical, but that is the plain truth, so far as my vote was concerned and so far as my influence, what little I had in the committee, was concerned. I should like to keep them out.

I realize that, having put peanuts in, no logical argument can be made why we should keep sugar beets and flax and beans and oats and barley out. I concede that frankly. I think we have made a mistake. I do not want to make another one.

I have been told by a Senator who is interested in the peanut matter that he proposes to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which peanuts were included in the bill. I hope that will be done. If we proceed now to put all these commodities in we will reach, I think, the condition in which the committee was when it put everything in and kept nothing out, and we will be in almost a ridiculous position. That is the reason why I feel constrained to vote against putting in sugar beets and sugarcane. If it goes on, we are going to take another step and put something else in, and I think I would be justified in voting to put anything else in that anybody wants to put in. I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, in answer to the inquiry made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] as to why cattle and sheep should be excluded from the bill I will say the primary reason is the perishable character of the commodities. The record is perfectly clear on that point, and there is no question that the extreme limit of time which may safely be employed in moving these commodities from the processor to the consumer is about 9 days. After that deterioration of the product begins and within another day or two the commodities must either be consumed or destroyed. Another compelling reason is found in the fact that the producers of cattle and sheep, almost without exception, are strongly opposed to the inclusion of their commodities in this bill. On this point I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that the law should apply only to those commodities the producers of which desire to enjoy the benefits of the bill.

Everybody knows two things about the bill; first, it is highly experimental, and there will be increased delays occasioned by the Government's administration of the movement. It follows, necessarily, that perishable commodities are less adapted to such legislation than those that are nonperishable. It is my conviction that the plan first considered, to include only wheat and cotton in the bill, would have provided an experiment with many more possibilities of success than are to be found in a plan of numerous commodities, of which at least some are perishable.

As suggested, I have received telegrams from all over the western country, from livestock associations large and small and from producers large and small, and practically every message has protested against the inclusion of cattle and sheep in the bill. Therefore, to involve these commodities against the wishes of the producers is not only unfair but because of their perishable character it is equally unsafe.

And, finally, it is unnecessary to impose such a penalty upon producers in the guise of a relief bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska indulge me just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish, Mr. President; I will be through in just a moment; then I will yield the floor and the Senator may discuss the question in his own time.

I concede that the questions propounded to me by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] are perfectly proper questions. I have answered them all according to my light, except one, and I have partially answered that one. I want to answer it more fully, and then I am through. I refer to the suggestion with regard to hogs and corn.

As I said in the beginning, I started out opposed to putting hogs and corn in the bill, and the only reason why I would vote against taking hogs out now is because of the possibility under this proposal of an agreement for which the bill provides. I have not talked with the Secretary as to whether or not he has been working on the agreements provided for, and I may be misinformed about it; but I am advised that there is strong probability of the Secretary's being able to make an agreement with a sufficient number of packers in the United States so as automatically to raise the price of hogs to the farmer, and that without any processing tax or anything else. If that is a possibility, I would not want to deprive the Secretary of Agriculture of the right to make such agreement. He wants both corn and hogs in the bill, as he stated in his testimony.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. I inquire if the pending question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. LONG. I just entered the Chamber a little while ago. Let me inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if he has been speaking on that amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I have.

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator has been speaking in favor of it?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I spoke against it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have been unable to understand a great deal of the logic of those behind the pending farm bill. I have wanted, if possible, to vote for it; but it has been exceedingly difficult to figure out a way by which I could justify any spark of conscience and record my vote in favor of this proposed farm legislation, if it may be called farm legislation. But, Mr. President, if this proposed legislation is to be fair and just and is to be administered in that spirit, I fail to see why the product of the cane farmers and the beet farmers should be excluded.

I wish to say for the benefit of the Senate that there is not a set of farm workers on the face of the earth who have received as meager a pittance for their labor from sun-up to sun-down and after sun-down and before sun-up as the sugar farmers of the State of Louisiana and, I believe, the beet farmers of the West.

Mr. President, if you have ever seen the work you know that it is the most laborious work done on the face of the living earth. Thousands and tens of thousands of poor devils have labored on the farms under the niggardly tariff we have had here, drawing all the way from 30 to 50 cents a day, sometimes as high as 60 to 75 cents a day; but even in the good times, when there was prosperity among the western farmers, the cane workers of the State of Louisiana have received wages not to be compared with the wages that have been enjoyed in the other agricultural enterprises of the country.

If we are going to penalize the cane farmer and the beet farmer, let us hesitate before we do so. We have already put peanuts in the bill almost by unanimous vote. The condition of those who have been thriving through the raising of peanuts certainly has never been as bad as the condition of those who have had to compete with free sugar brought here from the Philippine Islands. Something has been said about penalizing the sugar farmer because of the tariff. But Senators have forgotten that for many years we have been placed absolutely on a parity with the sugar that comes from the Philippine Islands and that sugar importation has increased year by year to such an extent that, if we do not free the Philippine Islands or do something else to relieve the situation, there will be no such thing in the next few years in the United States as domestic sugar business. There is no justification on earth for leaving out the beet farmer and the cane farmer, particularly if we are going to include peanuts in the bill. I submit as a matter of fairness that there are more farmers affected by the domestic production of sugar in the United States today than are involved in some of the other products included in the bill.

Frankly, I wish to make this confession: I do not think the farm bill will work. That is one time I agree with the author of the bill, or at least the nominal proponent of the bill. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and I have not agreed for a long time, but this is one time that I think we agree. I do not think this bill will work topside or bottom. I think it has in it some of the most foolish provisions I ever saw in legislation, either proposed or enacted. But the President says it is an experiment, and that is the basis on which many of us are trying to justify our votes in favor of the bill. If it is any good at all, Mr. President, do not leave the beet and cane people in the rain. If this is a decent bill, if there is any chance under the living sun for it to work out, then we cannot go back to the people raising beets in the West and cane in the South and tell them there is any justification for having left them in the rain, when they have not enjoyed much of the prosperity that many other agricultural interests have enjoyed in what were called the semiprosperous times.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I want to make a very brief statement about the sugar amendment. The amendment is absolutely inconsistent with the policy and purpose of the bill. In section 2, page 2, it is declared to be the policy of Congress "to establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor as will reestablish prices" and so forth. While, of course, it is encouraging to those who are supporting the bill to find the representatives of so many commodities anxious to come within its provisions, and while that fact clearly manifests the judgment of their representatives here, or at least the ratification of the will of the wishes of their constituents by them, that the bill will be helpful, still I hope that the bill will be held within reasonable limitations in the matter of the commodities to be included within its provisions, notwithstanding the great anxiety of Senators who are protesting the efficiency and effectiveness of the bill to get the products of their constituents within its terms.

As to the sugar question, I am informed that only about 25 percent of the sugar consumed in America is produced in America. The balance is imported. Therefore, it is impossible to deal with the question of sugar under the declared policy of the bill, to establish and maintain a balance between production and consumption in an effective way.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for a question.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is the Senator informed as to the plans of the Department of Agriculture, which have received considerable newspaper publicity, to establish a quota system with respect to sugar under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know nothing about any plans about a quota; but I know that unless sugar is brought under the terms of this bill by the Senator's amendment the Department will have no control over the subject under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] whether or not, in addition to his other powers, it is proposed to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to raise and lower tariffs or to effect embargoes under this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not care to yield to a Senator to ask questions of other Senators. I want to come to the point which the Senator from Maryland, with his clear mind, has gone directly to.

There are only two ways under this bill, except through agreement, by which a commodity may be benefited. One of those ways is by a reduction in acreage or production. Of course, neither the Senator from Colorado nor anyone else has any desire to reduce the production of sugar in America.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For a question only. I do not care to yield for a debate.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I say to the Senator that the proposed quota arrangement with respect to acreage evidently contemplates precisely what the Senator has in mind? There is in prospect, as we are advised by the press, under the marketing provisions of the bill, a plan to attempt to raise the price of sugar by limiting the amounts of sugar which may be brought into this country, not only from our own possessions but also from Cuba, and the amount which may be produced in the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, it ought to be perfectly clear to the distinguished Senator from Colorado that the production in America of sugar or any other commodity cannot be decreased under the provisions of this bill except by consent of the producer.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Is it not the purpose of this bill to raise the commodity price of the farmer's product? Is not that what we are trying to do—to give the farmer a living out of what he raises? Is not that what we are after?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no difference between the Senator from Louisiana and myself upon that subject.

Mr. LONG. All right. Our poor man raising sugar has his back absolutely broken. He is worse off today——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not want to engage in an argument; but the Senator ought to know that under sugar conditions, the only way to raise the price of sugar is to raise the tariff on sugar; and this is not a bill intended primarily to deal with the tariff problem, except so far as the compensatory features apply.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. That is one way to help, and I have been trying to tell the Senator from Alabama that, but I have not received a very responsive accord until now. The conversion has come too late for the sugar tariff.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not declared for any sugar tariff. Do not let the Senator's mind get confused on that subject.

Mr. LONG. I did not understand the Senator. I was just hoping that the Senator had, perhaps.

This tax is going to raise the price of the commodity. Does the Senator know of any reason why our sugar farmers of the West and of the South are not entitled to just as much consideration in this measure as the rice farmers or the cotton farmers or the wheat farmers? Why are they separated?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield. I will answer the Senator from Louisiana when the Senator from Maryland gets through. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to ask the Senator—though his remarks make my question almost unnecessary—whether he does not recall that agricultural products are one third of our entire exports at the present time and have been since the World War. We export about a billion and a half dollars' worth of agricultural products a year, under normal conditions. May I ask the Senator if the ultimate effect of an embargo on sugar will not bring us to the same pass that the Smoot-Hawley and other world tariff measures have brought us to, namely, of further destroying our markets for our agricultural surpluses abroad, because does not the Senator believe that retaliation will follow from any policy we pursue?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it tends directly in that direction.

Mr. President, without any intention of digressing into a general tariff controversy, I desire now to call the attention of Senators to the effect of this amendment.

I have already pointed out that it is not consistent with the policy of this bill, which is primarily to bring about an effective operation of the law of supply and demand. No such question is involved on a commodity when we produce only about 25 percent of our consumption of it and when our desire is to produce more, and not less, of that commodity.

As I stated, unless sugar is brought within the provisions of this bill, there is no way for the administration to deal with it on the subject of quotas. Not only that, Mr. President, but there is no provision in this bill, whether the amendment is included or not, under which such a result could be brought about—the reduction of acreage planted to sugar in this country. There is no provision in this bill, as has been repeatedly brought to the attention of the Senate, that gives the administration any compulsory power on the subject of production or acreage planting. So if it is the desire of the administration to enter upon some quota agreement, there is certainly nothing in this bill which would give to the administration power to reduce acreage or reduce production except where such reduction is voluntary and agreed to by the producers themselves.

So, as I stated, Mr. President, there are but two ways to benefit producers here. One is by the leasing of acreage. Who has a suggestion that sugar acreage should be leased and taken out of production, as, forsooth, may be contemplated as to rice, tobacco, cotton, wheat, and the other commodities in this bill? So that that feature of the bill would have no application whatever to sugar.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. CLARK. How about the provision that is in the bill about the cost of production?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator answer me a question? Is he in favor of putting sugar into this bill, with its tariff effects?

Mr. CLARK. I am in favor of letting anybody in the bill that wants to get in, and letting anybody out that wants to get out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So the Senator wants sugar in?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; I am going to vote to put sugar in.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, Mr. President, let us see the effect of that.

As I just said, there is no way to benefit the sugar growers under the leasing provision of the bill. The other method is what is commonly known as "the allotment plan", which provides the benefits to the producers; but, Mr. President, let no one forget that the application of the allotment plan to any commodity contemplates necessarily, to be effective, whatever benefits are paid, that there must be a voluntary agreement to reduce production of acreage in some agreed amount in order to receive the benefits following an allotment certificate. So that under either phase of the bill, rentals or allotments, it could not be applied to sugar; and no sugar producer, no representative of sugar constituents, would want the application of either plan to sugar on account of the necessity of bringing about a reduction either by leasing or by voluntarily agreeing in order to get the benefits of the plan.

If the allotment plan is applied—and that is the only one that could be applied—and a reduction in acreage follows in order to secure it, what is the result? Under the compensatory tariff provision of this bill, if an excise tax, for illustration, of 5 cents a pound should be put upon processed sugar in this country, in order to secure from that tax the money to be paid to the producer either for rental or for allotment benefits, then what is the result? Upon one fourth of the total consumption we put a tax to be paid to the producers. Upon three fourths of all the sugar consumed in America we place the same identical tax of 5 cents a pound additional upon every pound subject to the import duty under our tariff law.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that we produce one fourth of our consumptive demands of sugar. I desire to say to the Senator that the figures will show that we produce in the United States only between one fifth and one sixth of our consumptive demands of sugar.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thank the able Senator for that valuable information. I got my figures from the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the same argument that the Senator makes with respect to sugar apply to wheat and every other commodity?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator knows that there is no importation of the other articles involved in this bill. Why ask a question like that, when it answers itself?

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like the Senator to answer the question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have answered it. It has no practical effect, of course.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the answer to the question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The answer to the question is that there are no imports of the other commodities included in this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understood the Senator a moment ago to complain about this amendment being put in the bill because it meant that three fourths of the people of the Nation would have to bear the additional tax that would be imposed for the benefit of the one fourth that raised the sugar; and I ask the question whether that is not true of wheat and everything else in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the party to which the Senator belongs has dealt with the question of an adequate tariff upon sugar. They have placed it at a point, I assume, as high as they felt the consumers of America would stand; and that is the tariff duty that now exists in the law—the one that the party to which the Senator from Delaware is loyal adopted as an adequate and effective protective tariff upon the sugar industry.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understood the Senator a moment ago to say that the only relief that the sugar industry could have would be through the protective tariff. I desire to ask the Senator if he is in favor of sufficiently increasing the protective tariff so that the sugar industry will be put on a par with other American industries.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when a tariff bill comes before the Senate, that will be an appropriate and suitable place to deal with the question of the tariff. It is not my purpose, and has not been my intention, to make any argument for or against the tariff. I have had no thought of going into that line of discussion. I am merely pointing out to the Senate that without considering, as such subjects must be properly and carefully considered, the amount of increased tariffs that are justified, we ought not here, upon this bill, to incorporate a provision which, if put into application, would automatically also put into application the compensatory-tariff provision of this bill. So I submit that this is not the time nor the place to go into that subject on any commodity, whether sugar or any other commodity.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question? Then, I promise not to interrupt any more.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the last paragraph of section 15 of the bill distinctly provides:

> (e) During any period for which a processing tax is in effect with respect to any commodity there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon any article processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from such commodity and imported into the United States or any possession thereof to which this title applies, from any foreign country or from any possession of the United States to which this title does not apply, a compensating tax equal to the amount of the processing tax in effect with respect to domestic processing at the time of importation. Such tax shall be paid prior to the release of the article from customs custody or control.

The question I ask is how the Senator can possibly contend that, in the consideration of the pending bill, we must eliminate all consideration of the tariff question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not care to go into any debate with the Senator. I do not think it has any application to the bill. It is perfectly apparent on the facts presented here that the administration would not and could not properly put into operation any provision of this proposed law which would be helpful to the sugar growers. I, therefore, submit, in view of that unquestioned result, that we ought not further to open up the subject of the inclusion of this and other commodities which are to follow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

Mr. COSTIGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were allowed to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. COPELAND. I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote on this question, I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] has a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 37, as follows:

So Mr. COSTIGAN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on line 9, page 16, after the word "rice", to insert the word "flax."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber that we are unable to hear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, and the occupants of the galleries will likewise observe order.

The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Montana offers the following amendment:

On page 16, line 9, following the word "rice", to insert the word "flax."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is perfectly apparent that through a combination between peanuts and sugar——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, can we not have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will be seated. The Senator will suspend until the Senate is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent that, through a combination between peanuts and sugar, this bill is being placed in a condition where it will merit much of the criticism that has been directed against it by those who are opposed to it. I have no criticism to make of any Senator who is against the bill, and who feels that the way to make his opposition effective is to load it down with amendments which will render the measure impossible of execution; but I do want the friends of this measure, those who believe that its purpose is wholesome, who believe that its proponents have an honest desire to uplift agriculture, to understand that they are not rendering it any valuable assistance when they write into it peanuts and sugarcane as basic commodities.

Mr. President, this matter is of importance. If the friends of this proposed legislation are going to admit all commodities on the theory of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that everybody who "wants in" shall be permitted to come in and everybody who wishes to go out shall be permitted to go out, then there is not an excuse in the world for not admitting every agricultural commodity that knocks at the door for admission.

There is no Senator here who does not realize that the test of the value of this measure is whether or not it can be effectively administered. However, if we are going to make it apply to all agricultural commodities, if we define as basic agricultural commodities all the products of our fields and our soil, we shall put an impossible burden upon those who will be charged with the responsibility of administering this proposed act.

We are now at the point where we must determine whether we are going to destroy this bill by making it impossible of administration or whether we are going to give the President and those who support him an opportunity to accomplish something in behalf of agriculture.

Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Montana, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the last amendment was adopted.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I think I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Arkansas voted on the losing side, and therefore is not qualified to make the motion which he has made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I realize that I am on the losing side, and that if the point of order be made I am not in a position to make the motion.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in pressing my amendment to insert flax under this bill, let me say that in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the committee itself voted to include flax and they likewise voted to include peanuts. Finally, after some discussion, I said that if the committee struck out peanuts I would be perfectly willing to have flax eliminated, notwithstanding the fact that I felt it important to have flax included in the bill for this reason: If by this legislation the price of wheat shall be increased, thereby necessarily the production of flax will be lessened, and much land which is now planted in flax will in the future be seeded in wheat. Consequently it seems to me that it is quite necessary, if the bill is going to be successful in increasing the price of wheat, to include flax, so as to give the Secretary of Agriculture power to deal with flax just the same as he may deal with wheat. I think any person who is familiar with the wheat situation in the Northwest knows that those two crops are interchangeable. Farmers may seed wheat or flax upon identically the same land.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. When the Senator from Montana refers to flax in that connection he must be referring to seed flax?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Because the flax which is grown for fiber is in no sense interchangeable with the flax which the Senator is now discussing.

Mr. WHEELER. I am having reference not to fiber flax but to seed flax.

Mr. BARBOUR. And the Senator's amendment refers only to seed flax?

Mr. WHEELER. It refers only to seed flax.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand the terms of the Senator's amendment, it does not make it mandatory on the Secretary of Agriculture to apply this proposed act to flax or any other commodity of the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. So that in a bill in which we are granting authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to levy taxes and to impose tariffs, to take a tax from one commodity and to apply it to another, the adoption of this amendment would simply broaden the wide discretion that is already given to the Secretary of Agriculture, but would not in any way complicate the administration of the proposed act unless the Secretary should choose to impose that duty on himself?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Let me say to the Senate that when we had a similar bill embracing the allotment plan before the committee at the last session of Congress I took the same position as that of the Senator from Nebraska; that in view of the fact that it was an experiment we ought to try it on two of the major products—cotton and wheat—and I took the same position in reference to this bill. But the administration wanted cattle included; they wanted sheep included; they wanted rice included; they wanted corn included, and hogs, and milk and its products.

Now, let me say that, in my humble opinion, there is not any more doubt but that this bill will work so much more effectively with reference to flax than it will with reference to hogs or with reference to corn, there is not any comparison at all. In addition to that, if it will raise the price of wheat, then a great many people who are raising flax at the present time will immediately go into the wheat-raising business throughout the Northwest, and it will have the effect of making the bill less workable without flax than if flax be included. So I urge that my amendment be adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. I wonder if there would be any objection, in the light of what the Senator has just said, to inserting the word "seed" before the word "flax", so that it would read "seed flax"?

Mr. WHEELER. That would be all right, or "flaxseed."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the amendment is not offered in order to protect the other products, it being necessary to include flax in order to keep flax producers from going into the wheat-raising business?

Mr. WHEELER. There is not any question that if we should not include flax and leave in wheat a great many people in the Northwest who are now planting flax will plant wheat. I think the inclusion of flax will make the bill more workable, and I see no reason in the world why it should not be included in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. Are there any other agricultural products with which flaxseed would come in competition of which he knows?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know of any.

Mr. SMITH. My understanding was that perhaps the fiber flax might come in competition with other fibers, and it was provided in the original allotment bill, and at one time in this bill, that a compensating tax should be placed on those textile fibers that come in competition with the textile fibers covered by this bill, so that if the price were raised the other commodities competing therewith should pay a compensating tax; but I never before heard the element of flaxseed discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has made a motion to insert flax in the pending bill. I merely want to give notice that Oklahoma is the leading broomcorn-producing State in the United States. I can resist the temptation now, but, if flax goes in this bill, I might insist on broomcorn treading on its heels, because I, as well as others, am about to lose my virtue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. It is utterly impossible to hear the responses of Senators, and the vote cannot properly be recorded so long as the commotion in the galleries and the noise on the floor continue. I am sure if it were understood that such was the result that quiet would be maintained. I ask for order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will suspend calling the roll until Senators take their seats and refrain from conversation.

The Chief Clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I change my vote from "yea" to "nay", so that I may move to reconsider the vote at a later date.

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] has a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—32

So Mr. WHEELER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected and to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. Had not the Chair announced the result of the vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result of the vote had not been announced. The demand for the yeas and nays is sufficiently seconded. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the affirmative). Repeating the announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

So the motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I desire to enter a motion that the vote by which peanuts were included in the bill yesterday be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. FRAZIER. If the Senator from West Virginia will yield, I should like to make the motion now and dispose of it at this time.

Mr. HATFIELD. I do not care to yield for that purpose now.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask if the Senator from West Virginia did not yield to have the motion entered to reconsider the vote referred to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion has been entered.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I listened with much pleasure yesterday afternoon to the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who emphasized the fact that the nations of the world that have depreciated their currencies are seriously interfering with the return of prosperity to this land by flooding our markets with their goods, which are landed here below the domestic cost of production.

I wish to quote from the Senator's speech of April 17, 1933:

> With depreciated currencies in 44 countries, with the currency of Japan depreciated 60 percent, with England's depreciated 30 percent, with that of the Argentine 40 percent, with depreciated currencies ranging all the way from 50 percent down to 10 percent, how do you expect, Mr. President, under those circumstances, to bring back prosperity in the United States, when England is manipulating at this very moment not only the pound sterling but is likewise manipulating the dollar?
> Forty-four nations of the world have gone off the gold standard. Why did they do it? Because they had to have 40 percent of gold if they remained on the gold standard in order to carry on. When they could not keep the 40 percent of gold they had either to contract their currency to an extent that would cripple their business, or they had to go off the gold standard to maintain their currency upon some basis. Japan went down and, as I said a moment ago, has depreciated her currency 60 percent, and she is flooding our markets today with her manufactured products.

In substance, the Senator from Montana stated that he feared that if the measure known as the "farm bill", H.R. 3835, should be enacted into law, it would not cure the economic and industrial ills that are now going on in our land which affect the American farmer, nor would it stay the chaotic plight of our industrial condition.

Mr. President, I find myself strongly in agreement with the able Senator. I have been attempting since 1930 to point out this industrial situation that confronted us on all sides. I mean, Mr. President, in those countries east, west, north, and south whose destinies are directed under another flag. I tried to state from this floor the situation that was confronting the farmer, the wage earner, and the industrialist since September 1931.

Soon after England went off the gold standard, I appealed to the then President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, calling his attention to the fact that industries were shutting down for want of orders, and that many men were out of work for want of employment. In support of that statement, Mr. President, I quote the following paragraph from a letter written by me to the President on September 12, 1931:

> The tariff act protects the employment opportunities of our American workers; and I have the conviction that if some of the rates were higher in the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, greater relief would be experienced by American labor in these hours of depression, which would result in taking up some of the unemployment that exists in our country today.

In the early part of 1932 I addressed the Senate on the effects of the depreciated currencies of Europe and Asia, although at that time little or no attention was being given to this danger that threatened our domestic trade. On that occasion I said, in part:

> To my mind, the present tariff rates in effect on products of foreign industry, criticized as they have been by some Members of the Senate, are lower than present world-wide conditions justify. With foreign currencies, as in the case of England and Japan—two of the leading exporting nations—depreciated some 30 percent, the actual tariff protection or equalization in effect today is less in many cases than that which existed prior to the passage of the present tariff act.
> Mr. President, let us remain Americans and legislate for America. Let us follow the advice of the immortal Washington, as in doing so I believe we will be voting the sentiment of the American people. The American people as a whole are nationally minded.

On January 31 of this year I again spoke on how foreign depreciated currencies had affected our tariff rates. I quote a few paragraphs from this speech:

> Give the industries of this country the assurance of the home market by protecting these products against the products of those nations now off the gold standard, and the American Congress will accomplish two things, in my judgment. First, it will return millions of men to work; second, it will do more to force Europe and Asia back to a sound monetary basis than any international conference can accomplish.
> This action will help home industries. They will provide an adequate surplus by restoring their depleted warehouses and by so doing will put thousands of men to work who are now walking the streets and highways seeking the opportunity for earning a living that is denied them. Their unemployment has terminated their purchasing power.
> The farmer is the manufacturers' best friend in the way of a consumer; but the farmer cannot purchase unless he has a market for his products; and it has long since been demonstrated that the purchasing power of the forty-some million workmen under the American flag represents 80 percent of his market.

President Hoover on February 12, 1933, delivered in New York a Lincoln Day speech, in which he stated that our country was at the fork of three roads, which, in substance, he explained as follows:

First, he referred to a world economic conference, and possible raising of the standards of living of foreign workers to that of our own people, as a means of relief for industry and agriculture—a condition which it has been impossible to accomplish since the early progressive days of our Republic. It has been known to the nations of the world that the standard of living enjoyed in America surpassed all the rest.

Secondly, relief through a high degree of self-containment, the control of our production of agricultural and other products, and living largely in a state of nationalism, which so many of our economists and thinkers today condemn, notwithstanding our experience with Europe, beginning with the war of our independence, and coming down to the present time.

Third, another proposition that was opened to us was to inflate our currency, abandon the gold standard, depreciate our currency, and enter a world economic war.

In his messages to Congress in the few weeks that were left to him at the conclusion of his administration, the policy that President Hoover advocated to Congress was relief made possible by a facility established through the Treasury of the United States. This policy has been continued down to the present time. So all we have had to offer in the way of relief to the great army of wage earners has been through and by road development and the construction of a few Federal buildings. Then came the dole; again the dole, and then relief, all by the Government of the United States, necessarily in a limited way.

Mr. President, I have always been taught that the people should support the Government, except that where some citizen had been a defender of his Nation's flag, and through such support misfortune overtook him, then on account of his devotion to the Government should take care of him.

I, of course, know of our local Government's obligations to its wards who cannot help themselves; and I can assure this body that I, as an individual, have contributed liberally of my services and means to that group.

Here, however, we have a nation placed in the position of assuming the role of supporting almost one third of our wage earners who are embarrassed by this hopeless situation in which they find themselves dependent for bread and raiment upon the National Government. They do not want this charity, Mr. President. They want the opportunity to work, and, by so doing, to assist in the support of their Government.

The Senator from Montana pointed out the effect of depreciated currency on all groups in the United States. He uncovered the direful malady which is eating at our Nation's very vitals—a situation which has had my thought and serious consideration since the stock-market debacle, and what happened in Europe and Asia soon thereafter. I have been attempting to point out this very situation. I disagree with the able Senator only in the remedy to be applied.

Being a confirmed protectionist, as far as protection is necessary to serve the best interests of the great masses who toil, I have thus far attempted to secure the adoption of a measure dealing with depreciated currency by an excise tax, having for its purpose bringing Europe and Asia's basic units of value represented by their money up to a parity of unit of value, thereby establishing the differential of the cost of production at home and abroad, using this tax to make up the difference between the cheap money of Europe and Asia and our gold standard, and, by accomplishing this purpose, to save our industries from utter ruin.

In the article by Garet Garrett, which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of April 15, 1933, he stated:

> With the certainty of wind currents seeking the profitable vacuum, currents of merchandise gather and set hitherward from all parts of the earth. Sardines from Norway at prices ruinous to the sardine industry of the Maine coast, where presently 2 in every 3 factories are closed, fishermen are idle, and boats are tied up. Japanese scallops at Boston, 25 cents a gallon; and the Atlantic coast scallop industry in the dumps. Toys from Germany. Raw cotton from Egypt, not in the quantities usually imported for its special merit as a long-staple variety but in rising quantities, with the Federal Farm Board at Washington using public funds to support the price of American cotton. European steel bars for reenforcing concrete, with their ends clipped to remove the mark of their foreign origin, and used in public road work for the relief of American unemployment. Pig iron from Japan and British India at prices the American iron industry cannot match unless it is willing to go into liquidation, default on its existing capital, start all over again, and then offer such wages to the American ironworker as are paid in Japan and India.
> There is pig iron from Holland, too; and that is curious, because Holland is a gold-money country. The explanation is that Holland, with her gold money, buys ore in Spain, which is a depreciated-currency country, then smelts the ore in Holland and sells the pig iron here. The Hollander's profit is in the exchange with Spain. We might buy ore in Spain, too, and so reduce the cost of producing pig iron in this country, except that we have ore of our own to use. Each ton of foreign pig iron imported displaces the amount of American labor necessary to produce 2 tons of ore, 1¼ tons of coal, half a ton of limestone, besides the labor necessary to transport these materials by rail and water, and the labor represented at the furnaces and coke ovens.
> Then butter from New Zealand to the Pacific coast and cream from Canada into New York State, with the Federal Farm Board at Washington trying to support the dairy industry.

Mr. Theodore M. Knappen, writing in the Wall Street Magazine of April 1, stated:

> While 30 or 40 nations operating under the guerilla flag of no fixed value for their currencies have been storming our protective tariff walls, we have neither raised tariffs nor changed our monetary standards. Congress has held hearings on the subject until it is black in the face, and the Tariff Commission has accumulated a mountainous labyrinth of statistics.
> All the hearings and all the figures show that the United States is the export playground of the world.
> Manufacturers, farmers, and laboring men have pleaded tearfully for help, but there is no help.
> Worse and more of it, American home factories are shutting down and turning their business over to their foreign branches.

In an address delivered at the Wharton Alumni Institute, Philadelphia, March 23, 1933, by Prof. Wallace B. Donham, the author of Business Adrift, the following paragraph serves to emphasize the crux of the problem that faces the American people today and its solution:

> If we consider our home problems and work them out, the progress of science puts well within our grasp a higher material civilization than ever was dreamed of, a civilization based on high general standards of material living, not on a submerged class; a material civilization which makes a great civilization possible. But we cannot prosper with bankrupt farmers or many millions of industrial unemployed. Fifty million people cannot support 75 million ineffectives. Nor can we restore 75 million to effectiveness by international measures. * * * I agree with an eminent Englishman who recently said to me, "The best service you can do for Europe is to work out your own problems."

I commend his contribution at this hour of our country's peril as worthy of emulation by every lawmaker in the Congress as a sound policy in this period of reconstruction, which surely takes us back to the earlier periods of our Government's development in wealth and commerce, in trade, and in living conditions.

We have made our debts and we will pay them, although they were not contracted by our own wrongful action, but with the hope of a greater and more liberal democracy, in the interest of the great masses of the people both at home and abroad.

There is no question about the sincerity of those who had this vision; but, Mr. President, our expenditures of money that have been made, and will be made until they reach the colossal sum of $165,000,000,000 or more before the end, will be realized by the present generation and generations yet to come. In this period of our Nation's economic and commercial dilemma the Hearst newspapers have almost daily pointed out in vivid pictures the plight so ably portrayed by the Senator from Montana—the vision of labor and industry alike in one common concourse of appeals for relief. Yet, Mr. President, nothing constructive, looking toward relief, has even been undertaken other than placing additional responsibilities of a financial nature upon the backs of the American taxpayer in the way of issuing bonds and creating additional obligations through and by the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, during my efforts to secure consideration in the Seventy-second Congress of my amendment dealing with the subject of depreciated currency that was destroying every hope for work opportunities for the home labor and the market of the American farmer, there came reams of letters and telegrams in support of it; but my efforts all failed, seemingly for lact of support by Congress.

Mr. President, I can see a rift in the clouds. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], in most emphatic terms, presented proof and argument of the existence of the situation that no group of individuals can successfully contradict. Industrial records will disclose the fact that the situation has existed since the ravages of depreciated currency started soon after September 1931, at which time it laid upon American industry a hand that gradually paralyzed our entire economic structure, not unlike the ravages of some kind of a communicable disease upon the human body. Not one group among the almost innumerable groups under the American flag has escaped its ravages, which proves that our entire economic and industrial fabric is so interwoven that one is dependent upon the other. In other words, there are no unrelated industries in America; and our entanglements with world trade and world commerce have so enmeshed American industries located here and throughout the world that depreciated foreign currency has been like a great octopus that has devitalized our very existence, industrially and individually.

I say in all sincerity that the only thing, in my judgment, that will lift this depressed Nation from the despond into which it has lapsed is legislation that will effectually estop this vulture of depreciated currency that has blocked in one direction and drained in another the life stream that supplies the very vitals of our trade and commerce.

Mr. President, the diagnosis has been made. The treatment up to this hour has been palliative. All kinds of nostrums have been applied, and more are in the making, soon to be administered, no doubt, such as international conferences, reciprocity, horizontal cuts in our tariff law not unlike the tariff law rendered inoperative during the administration of that great American, Andrew Jackson, which resulted in a severe depression. Are all these new foreign remedies to be used, when we all know that it was a foreign plague that has brought us to our present plight?

Mr. President, I ask, When will restitution come? When will we return to those basic guides that directed the founders of this Government? Will it be after hopeless insolvency has engulfed all of the investments in stocks and bonds and insurance, which represent the widow's mite or the pittance of the old and decrepit who felt secure because he had laid away something for the rainy day when the debacle of 1929 came and continued? Will it only come when the homes, the farms, and the firesides have tumbled into one hopeless mass of bankruptcy?

Mr. President, let us apply this specific. Let us temporize no longer. We should not wait for next week or next year, or for some foreign potentate to suggest the remedy. If we are so dependent upon those in foreign lands in time of peace and distress, what must be our plight in the time of conflict, should it ever come?—which I hope and trust it may not. We have done nothing but succor Europe for the past 16 years. Our support enabled them to undermine and destroy the economic stability of our Government. Europe, in my judgment, cannot be stabilized again until revision of the Versailles Treaty is had. But that is Europe's trouble. We gave the Allies our best fighting men; we loaned them money, both private and public. Did they not by their conduct assist in the toppling over of the frenzied stock market in 1929 because of their vision of what was happening in Europe?

The trouble began at Vienna, at whose feet converge four great routes, hewn by nature in remote geological times. Through these mountain clefts, over these rolling plains, and down these fertile valleys swarmed the very progenitors of modern Europe. Ancient hunters, with stone axes, bows and arrows, intimately knew her forested glades and dwelt contentedly in her pleasant grasslands. Their successors, down the long march of the centuries, savagely have fought over these desirable areas to this very day. Today we find Vienna but a shadow of her former self, a condition brought about by the ravages of war and economic dislocations.

The next experience we had was the moratorium, followed soon by abandonment of the gold standard; and in these matters they only consulted us when they wanted something of a material nature. When their obligations became due, a few paid and the others defaulted; and at that time their deflated-currency policy was continually destroying the work opportunities for the American wage earner.

We know that the few gold-standard nations left protected themselves against the onslaught of these invaders, thereby protecting what they controlled under their own flags—with the exception of our own country; and we are still fiddling, bantering, and undertaking to bring about economic truces, notwithstanding the repeated disappointments in the way of promises and commercial losses we have sustained.

Mr. President, I, for one, protest. I have been protesting for the past 2½ years, but without avail.

If the noble patriots of the past could stem the tide of economic debacles, it seems to me that if we adopted the same policies and followed in their footsteps we ought at least to protect our industries, protect our wage earners, and bring our Nation together again and free it from the clutches that control it at this hour.

Mr. President, I quote from a former period in our country's history when, I believe, the prices received by the owners of commodities were lower than are the prices of commodities today.

I quote from Senator Gallinger's speech in the Senate on May 16, 1894, when he said, referring to conditions in 1816:

> Then great depression in all branches of business followed. Bankruptcy soon became general, and financial ruin was everywhere present. It could not be otherwise. Carey, Greeley, Clay, Benton, and others show that this was one of the most distressful periods of our national existence. Senator Benton, of Missouri, the leading Democrat of his time, describes our first experience in tariff reduction thus: "No price for property; no sales except those of the sheriff and the marshal; no purchasers at execution sales except the creditor or some hoarder of money; no employment for industry; no demand for labor; no sale for the products of the farm; no sound of the hammer, except that of the auctioneer knocking down property. Distress was the universal cry of the people; relief, the universal demand, was thundered at the doors of all legislatures, State and Federal."

Horace Greeley, speaking of what ensued, stated:

> Our manufacturers went down like grass before the mower; agriculture and labor soon followed. In New England fully one fourth of all property went through the sheriff's mill, with conditions about the same elsewhere.

It may be that those who own homes and farms were not visited by the specter of a mortgage placed upon their property at an inflated value, with the dollar today worth 50 percent of the value of the dollar when the mortgage was placed.

Mr. President, I am ready and willing to join hands with those who are ready to legislate for America. If it be remonetization of silver upon a sound and rational basis; if it be expansion of our currency, backed and protected by a redeemer that will redeem; if it be a surtax to equalize the difference between the gold standard and the depreciated currency, well and good. But let us adopt some method—stable, sound, and worthy of the policy laid down by the founders of the Government—and remember their motto, that "He who serves the people best serves the Nation well."

Mr. President, in the hope and with the belief that governmental aid to the farm-commodity producers will start our people again on the road to prosperity, it is my intention to vote for farm-relief legislation, provided such legislation will at the same time be helpful to the 40 million wageworkers among our people.

Irrespective of any legislation we pass, or the gift, directly or indirectly, of billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money to our farm-commodity producers, we will not constructively and permanently help the American farmers unless and until we furnish the 40 million American wageworkers with a sufficient purchasing power through profitable employment.

There are but few farm products of which we have a real exportable surplus. There are some farm products of which we export a small percentage of our production, not because of the willingness of the foreigner to buy but principally because of the inability of our own people to buy through their lack of purchasing power.

There is—or there would be—ample market in America for those farm products we export, other than cotton and wheat, if the 40 million American wageworkers had an income which would permit of their purchasing the foodstuffs for their families, which food they really need and should have.

Statistics of the Department of Commerce, 1931, volume 1, page 90, table 10, show that the only farm products mentioned in the bill of which we export more than 5 percent are wheat, cotton, tobacco, and lard, although lard really is a manufactured product. It is true that we also export some manufactured milk, but I contend that manufactured milk is virtually a factory product, while tobacco, of which we export almost 40 percent, is not a necessity of life.

For the information of the Senate, I have compiled a table which illustrates the yearly tax placed on American users of American cotton, wheat, pork, and corn by the pending farm bill.

Deducting our exports from the domestic production of these four major farm commodities, I find that the 40,000,000

American wageworkers will be expected to pay the consumer's tax provided for in this bill to the following extent:

Cotton, 8,009,000 bales, or 4,004,500,000 pounds, at an increase of 6 cents a pound, or a consumer's tax of	$240,270,000
Wheat, 776,000,000 bushels, at an increase of 56 cents a bushel, or a consumer's tax of	434,560,000
Corn, 2,604,000,000 bushels, at an increase of 45 cents a bushel, or a consumer's tax of	1,091,800,000
Pork, 8,351,000,000 pounds, at an increase of $4.30 a hundred pounds, or a consumer's tax of	359,093,000
Total	2,125,723,000

Apportioning this consumer's tax of more than $2,000,000,000 among the 40 million American wageworkers, being the consumers of these four major farm products, we find that each of these 40 million wageworkers will be called upon to assume an additional burden because of the consumer's tax of not less than $53.14.

The information which I have on this subject is not private. It is well known not only to those who study Government statistics but it is known also to the 15 million of American unemployed workers for whom, up to the present time, the Congress has offered nothing but poor-relief—charity, or work at a dollar a day.

While I am sympathetic with the needs of the cotton farmers and fully realize that the present price of cotton does not meet the American costs of production, I know, from the statistics of the Department of Commerce, that the cotton farmers for 1930 produced almost double the quantity they produced 10 years before.

Also, it is common knowledge that during the past 10 years, when the cotton acreage increased almost 50 percent, the cotton farmers knew full well of the development of the rayon industry and the fact that the products of this industry would to a great extent take the place of cotton as wearing apparel.

Mr. President, I have before me statistics in the form of two tables dealing with these facts, which I ask to have made part of my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[1] Pounds per acre.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the processor's tax in the pending farm bill levies a consumers' tax on every pound or bushel of the commodities included in the bill which will and must be used by the 40 millions of American wageworkers. Not only does the bill provide this enormous consumers' tax, amounting to more than $2,000,000,000 for the first year, or a per-capita tax of $53.14 on every one of the 40 million American wageworkers and the other millions dependent upon them, but, in addition thereto, it permits foreigners who purchase some of these raw materials at prices which are but a fraction of what the American processor pays, to ship such raw products in the form of manufactured materials back to the United States at total landed costs which are less than the American costs of production of comparable goods.

Thus, not only do those who sponsor this bill seek to levy a consumers' tax of not less than $53.14 on every one of the 40 million American wageworkers and the other many of these wageworkers will be denied an opportunity of employment due to the great solicitude which some Members of the Senate have for the welfare of foreign workers.

Therefore, in order to give to every American producer in his chosen field of endeavor at least a parity with the foreigner in the intense race for American trade, I offer this amendment.

Sectional legislation in the interest of one group which penalizes other groups, must, if not remedied, result in the same experience which history records followed a like legislative attitude in the nineteenth century. I am certain that no one wishes to see that experience repeated.

Why is it, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States takes the position it does—beginning at the wrong end in the effort to relieve the situation? In this situation in America which has continued to exist for 3½ years, why is not Congress, while willing to attempt to increase the price of the products to be consumed by the wageworkers, at the same time not also willing to uphold the hands of the wage earners and give them something in the way of encouragement, looking to the period when they may be steadily employed at a wage that is worthy of their hire?

There are no unrelated industries. America, let me urge, has been developed on the theory that we are one great family industrially. As the farmer is the manufacturers' most reliable customer, so the pay roll of America affords the only dependable market for the food products of the farmer. The profitable employment of the American wage earner is the proof.

I shall not hesitate to vote for legislation beneficial to our 10 million farmers provided that in so doing I am voting also for legislation which will provide employment for our 40 million wage earners. There are plenty of such workers to be found in West Virginia, Mr. President, and I would be ashamed to go back to that State, which has honored me by sending me here to represent them in this august body, and say to them, "I did not get protection for you in the mines and mills, in the forges and other industries of West Virginia, but I voted to penalize you in the way of the purchases that you necessarily must make in order to care for your families and provide any necessary food."

In voting for legislation beneficial to the farmers, Mr. President, I fully realize that, when given employment, the purchasing power of the 13 million of unemployed American workers will be of more value to the American farmer than any processor's tax or other legislative legerdemain that can be conceived by those now seeking to legislate to cure the ills and evils afflicting this country.

I believe that the sponsors of the pending farm relief bill, which places a consumer's tax of not less than $53.14 on every one of the 40 million American wageworkers for the benefit of the 10 million American farmers, and under which, in addition to the consumer's tax, an embargo may be placed on foreign farm products, should show their consistency by voting to place the same restrictions on the products of foreign industrial workers as they seek to place on the products of foreign agriculturists.

Mr. President, only a few days ago, by the vote on the motion to reconsider the passage of Senate bill 158, which is designed to shorten the hours of labor in this country but which at the same time, if enacted, will reduce the wages of labor, the opportunity was afforded to give the wage earners of America a chance for employment, but they were refused such a chance by a substantial majority. Notwithstanding that refusal, Mr. President, we find that this bill, through the same influence and the same support, gives to the 10 million American farmers absolute control of every farm commodity that is produced under the American flag, and that an embargo is placed against every import that must be subjected to the processor's tax. Yet this same group of Senators refuse to make restitution or give relief to the industrial workers of America. Ah, Mr. President, consistency should compel Senators to reverse their votes upon the amendment submitted by me to Senate bill 158, as a matter of equity and fair play, as a real solution to the industrial difficulty which exists in America today. The amendment proposed by me to that bill would have been helpful indeed to the American farmer and would have relieved him from any necessity of governmental support, save that of refinancing his mortgage that is now maturing and that threatens his homestead.

To indicate that the sponsors of this farm bill must have an embargo on foreign farm products, I desire to quote a statement of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10, 1933, page 1427. I quote:

> In order to make the bill effective at all it is necessary to place practically an embargo upon all commodities. If we do not place an embargo on them, it will be impossible to make the bill effective because of the depreciated currencies of other countries.

The senior Senator from Montana is properly recognized as one of the spokesmen for the present administration, and I do not believe that he, for one minute, would support legislation which would in any way be embarrassing to or opposed by the present occupant of the White House.

Mr. President, I seriously question the propriety of any Senator representing the industrial States voting to levy this consumers' tax of not less than $53.14 on every one of our 40 million American wageworkers, unless at the same time he votes to protect or provide employment opportunities for these 40 million American wageworkers in order at least that they may—other than through poor-relief or charity—secure the funds with which to pay this extra and enormous consumers' tax which we are asked to levy upon them.

Surely it is apparent to every Member of the Senate that unless a purchasing power is placed in the hands of the 15 million of present unemployed American wageworkers it will be necessary to provide for this consumers' tax by additional grants of Federal moneys to feed those who are unable to buy bread.

Mr. President, I can only see my way clear to vote for this legislation when this concession is given. Admittedly, it must be given. It was discussed in no uncertain terms by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] in pointing out that a depreciated currency would destroy the operation of the measure unless a complete embargo is had. If that is true, what must be the resulting effect upon the $75,000,000,000 or $80,000,000,000 worth of industrial products manufactured by the wage earners of America?

The proponents of the pending farm bill have stated the necessity of placing an embargo on foreign farm products in order that the pending farm bill may be successfully operated. We do not seek an embargo on foreign-made industrial products.

We do seek and must insist that the pending farm bill be amended, as a matter of justice and equity to industry and the farmers, so as to provide that imports of foreign industrial workers be barred from entry into our markets at total landed costs which are less than the American cost of production of similar and comparable American-made goods.

Mr. President, I have presented, and there is pending at the desk, an amendment to be added to subsection (e) of section 15, which I trust will be adopted.

The most beneficial legislation which Congress can enact for the benefit of American farmers is to insure an American market for the products of American industry and American agriculture. With the present 13,000,000 unemployed Americans restored to normal employment the purchasing ability of these millions of unemployed Americans would be of more help to eliminate the present surplus of American farm products and to permit of the American farmer receiving a profit on his labors than any legislation we could enact.

I have had this conviction for the last 2½ years. I am more convinced today than ever before in my life as a Member of this body that this kind of legislation will bring stability and order out of the chaotic condition which exists today and will bring about more contentment, more happiness, and more satisfaction to the wage earners of the country than any other legislation we can enact.

Differing from those who openly seek a complete embargo, we are willing to permit of the entry of foreign-made goods provided that these goods do not deprive American wageworkers of an opportunity of earning a proper living.

Further, we differ from those who sponsor the pending farm bill in that we do not seek to place a consumers' tax on those who purchase the products of American industrial workers.

I believe that there are several Members of the Senate who hesitate to vote for the consumers' tax, as provided for in the pending bill, who might vote favorably if proper provision was made to insure employment opportunities for our 40,000,000 wageworkers, of whom 13,000,000 are at present unable to secure employment, and for whom, up to the present time, no real relief, other than charity, has been given serious consideration.

Mr. President, there is every reason why I desire to vote for the pending farm bill; and if amended so as to provide employment opportunities for American workers by insuring the products of American labor a preference in the American market, I shall be pleased to do so.

The outstanding provision of the bill, and one which I believe would receive almost unanimous support, if it stood alone, is the provision wherein the Congress of the United States appropriates or provides some $2,000,000,000 in bonds to stay the hand of the auctioneer and the dispossessor.

Mr. President, that section of the pending farm bill is one which every Member of the Senate can support were it acted upon individually. I regret to say that unless the pending bill, of which the farm-mortgage relief is a part, is properly amended, it is my conviction that many Members of the Senate who desire to vote for the farm-mortgage relief section will find it necessary in the interest of the States they represent to vote against the entire bill.

The amendment which I have offered and upon which I will ask the Senate to vote, simply provides that the products of American industrial workers shall have an equal opportunity in the American market with the products of the cheap-paid labor of foreign countries. The amendment which I offered is in thorough accord with the provisions of this bill as they apply to imported agricultural products with the exception that the present bill, as has been well stated by some of its proponents, calls for a complete embargo, while the amendment which I have proposed does not deny entry of the industrial products of foreign labor, but does permit of American industrial workers securing employment now denied to them.

Mr. President, I trust it will be the pleasure of the Senate to demonstrate to the American wage earners that we desire to do something in the way of relieving the situation which confronts them at this hour by restoring to them the domestic market which is justly theirs, by voting to keep out cheap commodities made in the sweatshops of Europe and Asia, paid for in depreciated currencies at anywhere from 30 to 60 percent less than is paid for similar work under the American flag.

Mr. President, I hope that I may be favored with the yeas and nays upon the consideration of my amendment by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it may be of interest to refer very briefly to the subject of a definite monetary policy which bears on the question involved in the bill and on trade generally and as related also to the prosperity of the country. Something must be done, it seems to me, to arrive at some definite monetary policy in this country.

More than 30 nations, including England, have been forced off the gold basis.

Money loaned them and supplies sold them after the armistice—some $2,500,000,000—should be collected.

The total debt, as settled, amounted to about $22,000,000,000, to be paid over a period of 62 years, present payments being about $250,000,000 a year, with interest at 2.62 percent.

Prior to the funding they had paid some $900,000,000.

Prior to the moratorium they had paid $1,500,000,000.

France, Holland, and the United States now hold 70 percent of the world's gold.

It cost England over 28,000,000 pounds sterling to pay the 19,000,000 gold pounds of the December payment.

Our debtors claim it is impossible for them to pay in gold at present gold value of the dollar.

We cannot permit them to pay in goods.

The world's trade is badly hampered by the lack of world's metallic medium of value.

A little over 60 years ago England was the sole country on a gold basis.

France and the United States and a few others were bimetallic, gold and silver.

The others were on a silver basis—one half the world—Germany, Austria, Russia, Mexico, the Far East, most of Central and South America.

Germany went on gold and others were forced to follow.

There was a scarcity of gold. Its value went up and, conversely, world's prices went down, and it was not until discovery of rich fields in South Africa that prices commenced to go up.

Now there is another acute shortage of gold, with consequent depression in prices.

Five hundred billion dollars of the world's wealth was destroyed by the war.

Internal debts were enormously increased.

Many countries are now operating on a fluctuating paper currency—demoralizing trade.

Until a stable medium is established there is no hope of revival of trade or an increase in prices.

There is not enough gold to enable the various nations to stabilize their currencies on the basis existing before the war. There must be found some other basis for currency.

France, Italy, and Belgium have revalued their currencies at less than one quarter the previous amount of gold in them.

England is on a managed paper currency, but indicates it will soon be on a metallic basis—it may be gold but with a decreased amount of gold in the pound sterling.

If England and the United States would adopt a measure of value consisting of gold and silver, perhaps the Marshall plan, the rest of the world would follow and we would have a stable measure which would stimulate trade, raise values, and change the psychological condition from one of fear to hope and gradually lead to prosperity.

What is needed is not so much more money as increased velocity in its movement. What appears to be in circulation is not really circulating. This calls for what is called "controlled inflation".

Something must be done to raise prices of our commodities, or we cannot pay our private debts or the taxes necessary to carry on our National, State, and local governments, and provide interest and sinking fund on their bonded debts. Our monetary policy must be established to accomplish that purpose.

The gross income of our people last year was $45,000,000,000.

The personal, corporate, and public debt is $150,000,000,000.

The taxes for National, State, and local governments amount to $15,000,000,000.

With normal prices for our products our gross income should be $100,000,000,000.

We must put our dollar on an equal basis with the currency of other great trading nations.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONERGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator believe that the policy adopted today of refusing to ship gold abroad will bring about the condition which he thinks so desirable?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not advised about that policy; but if the Senator says that has been ordered, I think it is perfectly sound in order to prevent this country from being drained of its gold.

Mr. DILL. Is there any defense for allowing foreigners to take gold out of this country when we will not allow our own people to have gold for their own money?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; precisely, and that is the reason for the embargo, I think.

Mr. DILL. And is not inflation by that method far preferable to the printing-press method, since it can be managed and controlled?

Mr. FLETCHER. If it can be managed and controlled.

Mr. DILL. Of course, it can be, by the same method England used.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. I think it is necessary to have a proper, wise, sound system of inflation established, and a policy to that end. I think it is necessary to make this kind of an order to prohibit the shipment of gold out of the country. I think that is important.

The term "printing press" sometimes is used as a term of reproach, but the Supreme Court has held that printing money is the same as coining money under the Constitution of the United States. If the printed money rests upon a sound basis of value, I do not object to its being printed. I think a very good idea would be to have gold and silver, or whatever metallic basis may be agreed upon by the important nations of the world, in bars, and not coined at all, but to have it in bars as a reserve, and to have paper money printed and circulated instead.

A friend of mine recently sent me an article which it seems to me is quite pertinent to conditions today. It is entitled "Remedies for Fluctuations of General Prices." It is an article by Prof. Alfred Marshall, appearing in the Contemporary Review, of London, for March 1887. It is a very suggestive article; and I am going to ask to have it printed in the RECORD, because I think it applies to conditions today.

I am quite sure that if important nations—England and the United States, for instance—could agree upon a plan of this sort, basing their currency upon one half gold and one half silver, if you like, and not coining any of it except for subsidiary coins, but keeping it in bars, we would have a safe and sound basis for the currency of the world, and the world's trade would proceed properly, and exchanges would be adjusted according to that.

At any rate, this article is worth reading today, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From Remedies for Fluctuations of General Prices]

(Article by Prof. Alfred Marshall in the Contemporary Review, London, for March 1887)

A PROPOSAL FOR A STABLE BIMETALLISM

It is with great diffidence that I suggest an alternative bimetallic scheme. I am not sanguine enough to hope that I have found the best possible solution of the difficulty; but my plan, whatever its faults may be, seems to have this claim for consideration—that it would be a genuine and stable bimetallism. It would therefore give a slightly better standard of purchasing power than our present currency; and, what is more important, it would form a basis of international currency. An international gold coinage would disturb trade by causing a violent fall in prices; an international silver coinage would have even greater evils. But a system of currency based on both gold and silver could become international; and that is, to my mind, the chief reason why it is worth while to inquire what is the best possible form of bimetallism.

Ricardo suggested that we should use a paper currency resting on a basis not of coin but of stamped gold bars weighing 20 ounces each. If, he argued, the currency were in excess and showed signs of falling below its gold value, it would be taken to the mint and exchanged for gold bars for exportation; if it were deficient, gold bars would be brought to the mint and currency demanded. Within the country the paper would be a perfect medium of exchange, while for the payment of the balances of foreign trade stamped gold bars are better suited than coins.

The currency scheme which I wish to submit for consideration differs from his only by being bimetallic instead of monometallic. I propose that currency should be exchangeable at the mint or issue department not for gold but for gold and silver, at the rate of not £1 for 113 grains of gold but £1 for 56½ grains of gold, together with, say, 20 times as many grains of silver. I would make up the gold and silver bars in gram weights, so as to be useful for international trade. A gold bar of 100 grams, together with a silver bar, say, 20 (this number 20, or whatever it might be, would be fixed on arbitrarily once for all; if we wished the value of the currency to be regulated chiefly by gold we should have only a small bar of silver, if chiefly by silver we should have perhaps 50 or 100 times as heavy a bar of silver as that of gold; but if we wished the two metals to have about equal influence, we should, taking account of the existing stocks of the two metals, probably choose our silver bar about 20 times as heavy as that of gold) times as heavy, would be exchangeable at the issue department for an amount of the currency which would be calculated and fixed once for all when the scheme was introduced. (It would be about £28 or £30, according to the basis of calculation.)

Anyone who wanted to buy or sell gold or silver alone in exchange for currency could get what he wanted by exchanging gold for silver, or silver for gold, at the market rate. Government fixing its own rates from day to day, so as to keep its reserves of the two metals in about the right proportion, might safely undertake this exchange itself; and then anyone could buy or sell either gold or silver for currency in one operation.

To insure convertibility the currency would not be allowed to exceed, say, three times the bullion reserve in the issue department. (Except in times of emergency, when the minimum rate of discount was, say, 10 percent, and then the rule might be broken either, as now, by the authority of the Government or, which I think would be better, by a self-acting rule.) The country would save so much on the cost of its currency that it could well afford to keep, as a normal reserve, bullion worth, say, £30,000,000 in excess of this limit, and thus prevent the sudden stringencies which we now suffer whenever there is even a small foreign drain of bullion. (Thus, if the currency consisted of notes for £120,000,000 besides silver and bronze token coins, the normal reserve would be £70,000,000. The management of the reserves might be intrusted to the Bank of England or a government bank which would act directly, as now, on the rate of discount, so as to keep the supply of gold and silver at about the right level, or a government department with no general banking functions might exercise an indirect pressure on the rate of discount by selling consols for currency when the reserve was getting too low, and buying them in again so as to let out the currency when the reserve was getting too large.)

There would be, as now, token coins of silver and bronze, but none of gold, because even a small percentage on the value of a gold coin is sufficient to pay the illicit coiner.

Ricardo's proposal was made at a time when the mismanagement of paper issues at home and abroad had made the notion of a paper currency repugnant to all prudent people. But now there is a greater tendency to discriminate between paper money, which has no sound basis and which may fairly be called soft money, and paper whose convertibility into hard metal is properly secured. The strangeness of the scheme will make many refuse to examine it closely; but those who can overcome their natural repugnance to the use of paper money will, I think, find it has the following advantages: (1) It would be economical and secure; (2) though economical, the largeness of its reserve would obviate the sharp twinges there now frequently occur in the money market; (3) it would vary in value with the mean of the values of gold and silver; (4) as it would in no way attempt to control the relative values of gold and silver, and would not be affected even if an ounce of gold became worth 50 ounces of silver, it could be begun at once and without risk by any one nation; (5) if adopted by several nations it would constitute at once a perfect international basis of currency and prices; (France could, if it chose, still reckon in francs, England in pounds, and America in dollars, but every 20-franc note would state on its face how many francs were exchangeable for a standard pair of bars of 100 grammes of gold and 200 grammes of silver; and therefore the equivalent in pounds, shillings, and pence of 100 francs would be settled once for all. There would be nothing to be allowed as now for seignorage or for wear and tear of coins. Francs, pounds, or dollars would alike give a definite command over bars of gold and silver, which would form a perfect medium for international payment.); (6) lastly, it has in my eyes an advantage which may appear fanciful, and on which I do not wish to lay any great stress, viz, that it is a movement in the direction in which we want to go of a tabular standard for deferred payments. If there should ever exist any other commodities besides gold and silver, which, like them, are imperishable, which have great value in small bulk, and are in universal demand, and which are thus suitable for paying the balances of foreign trade, then they could be added to gold and silver as the basis of the currency.

It has the one great disadvantage of being a paper currency, but this is, I contend, shared to a great extent by the fixed-ratio-mintage scheme, for under that paper would probably have to begin to take the place of gold almost at once, and before long would be very likely to extrude it altogether.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum, and I move a roll call.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion in order that I may offer my amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. For the moment I yield to the Senator from West Virginia, not to disturb the roll call, however; and I ask that the roll call occur following the presentation of his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from West Virginia proposes the following amendment:

On page 21, line 12, insert the following: "To insure a purchasing power on the part of American consumers the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, while this section continues in force and effect, to prohibit the entry of foreign-made goods, which goods are similar or comparable to goods produced in America if such foreign-made goods are entered at total landed costs which are less than American costs of production of similar or comparable American-made goods. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make findings of the cost of production, and his decision shall be final."

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that a roll call may be had at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I wonder if a proper corollary to that amendment ought not to be that we will implore other nations not to impose a prohibition upon our exports in the event that our exports may be produced a little cheaper than those in other countries.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I take it that it is the desire of the Senator from West Virginia that the amendment tendered by him may lie on the table, subject to call. Therefore, I ask for the call of a quorum at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Cutting	Lewis	Russell
Austin	Dickinson	Logan	Schall
Bachman	Dieterich	Lonergan	Sheppard
Bailey	Dill	Long	Shipstead
Bankhead	Duffy	McAdoo	Smith
Barbour	Erickson	McGill	Steiwer
Barkley	Fletcher	McKellar	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Glass	Murphy	Trammell
Bulow	Goldsborough	Neely	Tydings
Capper	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Caraway	Harrison	Norris	Van Nuys
Carey	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Clark	Hatfield	Overton	Walcott
Connally	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Coolidge	Kean	Pope	Wheeler
Copeland	Kendrick	Reed	White
Costigan	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD].

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask to have the amendment stated for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be restated.

The legislative clerk restated the amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I wonder if the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] will accept this amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from West Virginia could have offered an amendment more contrary to the individual views of the chairman of the committee; but, in all fairness to him, I want the Senate to vote on the amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. LONG. I hope everybody will vote for it, Mr. President. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a question? This amendment simply means that whatever value we put on imports foreigners will pay according to the same yardstick?

Mr. HATFIELD. It brings the European values up to a parity with the gold standard under the American flag.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. In other words, it is an absolute embargo.

Mr. HATFIELD. Oh, no!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I heard the amendment read, I thought it provided for an embargo. I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be restated.

The legislative clerk restated the amendment.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], on which the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] has a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON].

Mr. NORBECK (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], but I am advised that if present he would vote as I have voted, and I therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent on account of illness. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—28

Austin	Goldsborough	Long	Schall
Bailey	Hale	McNary	Shipstead
Barbour	Hastings	Metcalf	Steiwer
Capper	Hatfield	Nye	Townsend
Carey	Hebert	Patteron	Vandenberg
Dickinson	Kean	Reed	Walcott
Frazier	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.	White

NAYS—50

Adams	Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Costigan	La Follette	Russell
Bankhead	Couzens	Lewis	Sheppard
Barkley	Cutting	Logan	Smith
Black	Dieterich	Lonergan	Stephens
Borah	Dill	McGill	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Duffy	McKellar	Trammell
Bulkley	Erickson	Murphy	Tydings
Bulow	Fletcher	Neely	Van Nuys
Caraway	George	Norbeck	Wagner

NOT VOTING—17

Ashurst	Dale	King	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	Davis	McAdoo	Wheeler
Bratton	Fess	McCarran
Byrd	Gore	Pittman
Byrnes	Johnson	Reynolds

So Mr. HATFIELD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH obtained the floor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to page 29, line 11, where the provision concerning the lending of money on farm land appears. The provision is that money may be loaned to the amount of 50 percent of the value of the land mortgaged. I call attention to the fact that at other places in the bill the words "normal value" are used. I wonder whether the Senator would have any objection to inserting the word "normal" before the word "value" at this place?

Mr. SMITH. I will state to the Senator from Washington that we have not yet reached that title, and when we reach it, I do not think there will be any objection to the incorporation of the word to which he refers.

Mr. GLASS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GLASS. What is the status of the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment including peanuts was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was entered.

Mr. GLASS. Is the Senator going to insist upon that motion?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, that is my intention. I ask leave to call up the motion I offered a few minutes ago to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to include peanuts in the bill was agreed to yesterday.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has told me that he voted against including peanuts, and therefore I make the point of order that he has no right to make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote on the amendment was not a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. GLASS. The rule does not say anything about a yea-and-nay vote. The rule reads:

> When a question has been decided by the Senate, any Senator voting with the prevailing side or who has not voted may * * * move a reconsideration.

In this case the Senator admits he did not vote with the prevailing side.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I make the point of order that no record vote was had on the amendment, and therefore any Senator is at liberty to move a reconsideration.

Mr. GLASS. Not under the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; under the rule.

Mr. GLASS. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to look at the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am familiar with the rule, and it has been interpreted a hundred times in the precedents that where no record vote is made of a vote, any Senator is at liberty to move a reconsideration.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the rule does not so read. The rule provides:

> When a question has been decided by the Senate, any Senator voting with the prevailing side or who has not voted may * * * move a reconsideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, Mr. President; but where no record is taken, any Senator, under the unanimous precedents, is entitled to make the motion.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from North Dakota admits he did not vote with the prevailing side.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That makes no difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the parliamentary clerk that the motion is in order.

Mr. LONG. I am just going to suggest to my friend the Senator from North Dakota that, inasmuch as he did not vote with the prevailing side, but voted against the amendment in the first place, I do not believe he would want to move to reconsider. I do not believe he would want to ask for a reconsideration, as a matter of equity and justice in the matter.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, yesterday, when the Senator from Virginia offered his amendment, I made the statement that I had no particular objection to peanuts being included in the bill, but that I thought that if peanuts were included other farm products should also be included. Peanuts and sugar beets were both voted into the bill. Later on an amendment to include flax was voted down. If other products are to be put in, I wish to offer an amendment to include oats in the bill. Oats is the second largest grain crop raised in the United States, and there is a surplus of oats. But the vote upon flax seemed to indicate that there would be no further inclusion of grains, and therefore I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which peanuts were put into the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Virginia has made a motion to lay on the table the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. CLARK. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. CLARK. While it has unquestionably been the practice, where there was no record vote, to permit any Senator to make a motion to reconsider, nevertheless when a Senator affirmatively states that he did not vote on the prevailing side it flies right in the teeth of the rule to allow that Senator to make the motion. The rule provides:

> When a question has been decided by the Senate, any Senator voting with the prevailing side or who has not voted may * * * move a reconsideration.

The rule does not say anything about whether there is a record vote or not. I insist, Mr. President, that where a Senator affirmatively states that he did not vote with the prevailing side, under the rule he is not entitled to make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. CLARK. I ask for a ruling on my point of order. I make the point of order that the Senator from North Dakota is not entitled to make a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GLASS. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. CLARK. In deference to the request of the Senator from Virginia, I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. GLASS. I renew my motion to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair, I transfer it to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent on account of illness. I am not advised as to how he would vote on this question, if present. I find that I can transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I make that transfer and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NORBECK (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I find that upon this vote I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and, therefore, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

The roll call resulted—yeas 38, nays 38, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this vote the yeas are 38 and the nays are 38——

Mr. LONG. A parliamentary inquiry. When the vote is a tie——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair declares——

Mr. MCADOO. I beg leave to change my vote from "nay" to "yea." I voted under a misapprehension.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table is rejected.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from California has asked to change his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator cannot do that after the result has been announced.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That cannot now be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the vote has been announced the change cannot be made. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the Senator from Virginia was adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is ill and absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. NORBECK. Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. Upon this question I have a pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

I also wish to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business: The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

So Mr. FRAZIER's motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was adopted was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to decide this matter so hastily. We have been going entirely too fast to suit me. It was very unfortunate that the vote was a tie vote—38–38—and but for the mistake of the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] it would have been 39 to 37. Then we have the further difficulty of the transferring of pairs having thrown 2 or 3 votes out of line. Several Members of the Senate thought the question was settled.

I want to suggest, instead of undertaking to dispose of the question now, several Senators being absent, that we postpone a vote on the matter until we have disposed of some other questions. I am not asking any more than I have granted. I consented to the displacement of my amendment the other day in order that we might go ahead with other amendments. I do not think we should vote on this question today, or at least at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. It seems to me the time has arrived when a limitation might very well be agreed upon looking to the conclusion of the consideration of the bill at least sometime tomorrow. My thought has been that if we could complete the bill and, perhaps, dispose of one or two other relatively small matters, we could recess over the week-end and thus afford Senators an opportunity to clear up work in their offices, and committees the opportunity of completing some of their work. Almost a week ago negotiations were in progress for an arrangement limiting debate, and they narrowly failed of agreement.

Almost every phase of the bill has been discussed. It is true there are a number of so-called "perfecting amendments" which are yet to be disposed of, and there is one important amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill; but every issue that will arise under the amendment last referred to has already been discussed at length in the Senate, so it seems to me with the limitation I am going to propose that we ought to be able to reach an agreement.

I ask unanimous consent that future debate on the bill be limited so that no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes on any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am going to object and half a dozen more Senators are going to object to any kind of an agreement at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then I move to lay on the table the amendment which was just reconsidered, known as "the peanuts amendment," and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. If the motion of the Senator from Arkansas is agreed to, does it carry with it the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to lay on the table the so-called "peanut amendment."

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, has the Chair answered the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Missouri?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did answer the inquiry. If the motion of the Senator from Arkansas is agreed to, it does not carry with it the bill. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORBECK (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and, therefore, withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] has a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—44

Ashurst	Copeland	King	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Cutting	La Follette	Schall
Bankhead	Dickinson	Lewis	Sheppard
Black	Dieterich	Lonergan	Shipstead
Bone	Dill	McKellar	Steiwer

NOT VOTING—12

Barkley	Davis	Johnson	Norbeck
Bratton	Fess	Kendrick	Reynolds
Dale	Hayden	Logan	Wheeler

So the motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas to lay the amendment on the table was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments to title I?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Missouri offers the following amendment:

On page 8, line 17, add a new paragraph, to be known as "paragraph (5)", as follows:

"(5) The expenditures for purposes of administration authorized in this act shall not exceed 5 percent of the amount collected under the tax on processors herein authorized."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this bill levies a tax directly on the processors of every agricultural product included in the bill, and indirectly on the consumers of those products, for the avowed purpose of conferring benefits upon the producers and farmers of the United States.

We have all seen, in the last 4 years, the disgraceful episode in which vast sums of money appropriated for the use of the Farm Board have been very largely dissipated in the payment of enormous and outrageous salaries to the officials of the Farm Board and the officials of the cooperatives organized under the Farm Board. It seems to me that there should be some limitation placed in this bill as to the expense of its administration. A limitation of 5 percent on the amount of the processors' tax collected is certainly a very liberal allowance for administration to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I favor the amendment of the Senator from Missouri; but it strikes me it would be advisable to include in the amendment, or some other paragraph of the bill, a requirement that an itemized statement should be made of the expenditures incurred in carrying on the machinery provided by the bill, and that this information should be transmitted to Congress, say, every 6 months, anyway.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will prepare such an amendment, so far as I am concerned I shall be glad to vote for it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have not even seen the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I have just heard it read. I think I shall prepare an amendment of that character. I think the provision suggested by the Senator from Missouri is a very wise one.

We all know, from our experience with the Farm Board when we had up the discussion of the confirmation of the members of the Farm Board some few months ago, that information was brought to the Senate at that time of the waste and extravagance of that Board in its administration in the way of extravagant salaries and in the way of duplication of work. There were a number of its employees who were drawing salaries ranging from $20,000 to $35,000 a year, one drawing $50,000, and another $65,000.

Mr. KING. Seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Seventy-five thousand dollars; I am corrected. I believe that in all of this legislation we should make an effort to place some restriction upon these extravagant salaries and the waste of the public funds in that way.

The American people now are more or less antagonistic to Government employees, and they are almost maddening in their demands for economy; but those demands for economy, so far as the American people are concerned, do not stop at the person who receives only a small salary. It sometimes seems to me that on the part of those who are legislating, when we get beyond a small salary, the tendency is to permit the officials to proceed as rapidly as they wish and as often as they wish in doling out excessive salaries—ten, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five thousand dollars.

When we had up here the question of restricting salaries and lowering salaries, the Senate will recall that an effort was made on the part of some of us to have a graduated salary reduction, the percentage increasing as the salary went higher, and that that was voted down by a good majority of the Members of the Senate.

I was very much delighted to see that the Florida Legislature, a few days ago, when they took up the question of reducing salaries, stated in the measure which was before the house, and later the senate, that the person who received ten, twelve, or fifteen thousand dollars salary per annum could stand a greater percentage of reduction than some person who was receiving only $1,200, $1,500, or $2,000 salary.

I mention these features because I forecast, and it is my opinion, that before the legislative bodies of this country get through with the question of economy in salaries the American people are going to demand a larger reduction and a greater percentage of reduction on those who can afford to have their salaries reduced more than those drawing the small salaries. This proposal, I think, will have a splendid deterrent effect; and I hope the amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he has made any investigation to ascertain the probable amount of the tax that will be collected under this bill?

Mr. CLARK. No; I have not, I will say to the Senator. I have heard it estimated at $800,000,000 here on the floor; but I presume one man's guess is as good as that of another.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] if, in the investigations made by his committee, any data were submitted which would enable him to form an opinion as to the amount of tax that will be collected?

Mr. SMITH. There were not; and, Mr. President, it seems to me to be practically impossible to estimate just what may be the expenditures necessary to put this plan into operation.

In the first place, not all of the articles included may call for expenditures. Others may call for expenditures. No estimate was made—and that question was discussed before the committee—as to what would be the probable cost; and it was impossible for us to ascertain from those who drafted the bill and brought it in and discussed it what might be the cost.

Necessarily, as the Senator can see, this being an experiment in an untried field no one knows just how many persons will be employed or just what the necessary expense will be. It is my opinion that in reference to that feature we shall have to take this matter on faith, just as we are taking the plan that is involved here; and that, I presume, is the reason why no estimate of the expense was made. If we intend to try this experiment, I do not see how we can begin by fixing an arbitrary amount beyond which the officials may not go in administering the act, because the success of the very experiment itself may depend upon the amount necessary to put it into operation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, evidently the Senator has in his mind the Scripture which says that—Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; that is very good.

Mr. KING. And, if the present administration were to follow the unwise and impractical policies of the preceding administration in dealing with farm relief, the expenditures involved in enforcing this bill will be larger than many anticipate. Bureaucracy is a system or condition which functions with but slight variation in all administrations.

The statement just made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] does not tell the entire story of the profligate waste incident to the administration of the farm bill. The salaries were outrageous; the number of employees was greatly in excess of any legitimate demands; and the policies adopted were so unsound that failure was inevitable.

I am advised that quite recently, under the old administration, in the execution of the act respecting the loaning of money for crop production, as high as 1,400 employees were added to the already large personnel of the Agricultural Department. I have no doubt that under this bill, unless there are some restrictions—because we know the tendency of bureaucracy, whether Republicans or Democrats are in power—there will be an enormous army of employees, and salaries will be paid that are wholly unjustifiable and expenditures made that may not be warranted.

However, the attitude of the President in regard to governmental expenditures is reassuring. We know that he is determined to reduce expenses and to introduce needed economies into all branches of the Government. The Agricultural Department has for a number of years been extravagant in its administration and ambitious for more authority and power. It is still manned by many officials who have been guided by the former spirit and policies of the Department. We have reason to believe, however, that the new Secretary of Agriculture will exercise prudence and be guided by the spirit of economy and the desire to efficiently administer the heavy responsibilities of his office.

I have been informed that the bill before us, when in full operation, will raise commodity prices one or two billion dollars, and, of course, the costs of administration will be very great. It would seem that there should be some limitation either on the aggregate amount to be expended to meet the costs of administration or on the salaries that shall be paid.

Unless further light is shed upon this matter, I shall be inclined to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I regret that we are left without adequate information to enable us to determine just what limits should be fixed.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Utah. Do I understand him to say that there will be a billion or two billion dollars tax levied upon the people of this country to enforce this law? Am I in error in my understanding of the Senator's statement?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps I did not state the matter accurately. My understanding is that it is claimed by the proponents of this bill that the costs of agricultural commodities affected by this bill will be increased more than a billion dollars, which, of course, the people will be compelled to pay. As to the amount of taxes the processors and others who may come within the terms of the bill will have to pay, I am unable to state. I have heard it stated that the taxes would exceed $1,000,000,000 and that the increased cost to the consumers of the products affected by this bill would exceed that sum. I regret that we do not have full data in order that we may accurately decide this question.

Mr. CLARK and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has the floor. Does he yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to interrogate the Senator from Utah again in furtherance of my former question. Is it understood that the people of America are to bear a tax of $2,000,000,000 for the operation of the bill now pending before the Senate? I should like to have a categorical answer from the learned Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, assuming that the Senator is entitled to a categorical reply, I can make no different statement concerning the effect of the bill upon commodity prices than that which I have made. I have heard it stated that this measure is designed to raise the prices of agricultural commodities and that the increase in such prices would be between one and two billion dollars annually. I am not a member of the committee, and do not know whether the testimony before the committee justifies those statements. I merely state, upon information which I think is to be found in the public prints, that it is supposed that this bill will increase commodity prices to the consumers to the extent stated.

Mr. McGILL and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas for a question.

Mr. McGILL. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah a question, if I may. As a member of the committee, I may say to the Senator that I fail to recall any testimony in which figures were given such as the Senator has stated on the floor. I am wondering if he is at liberty to give to the Senate the source of his information.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the papers have stated—I know I have read it in some—that the results of this bill would be that the consumers of the United States would be required to pay higher prices for farm products, and that the aggregate amount would be such as I have indicated.

No doubt the Senator will admit that the purpose of the bill is to increase commodity prices and that the consumers will have to pay such increased prices.

Mr. McGILL. Certainly the purpose of the bill is to increase commodity prices, and I am in favor of that being accomplished.

Mr. KING. So am I.

Mr. McGILL. However, I am sure the Senator can only give newspaper rumors as the source of information that this would involve a $2,000,000,000 tax on the American people. He cannot disclose any testimony to that effect given before any of the committees of Congress.

Mr. KING and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Utah to reply to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. KING. With the courtesy of my friend from Nevada, I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question.

From the investigations which he has made, what does he think will be the increase in prices of the agricultural products which will be brought within the operations of this bill, directly and indirectly?

Mr. McGILL. I can only answer from the testimony given by the Secretary of Agriculture before the committee with reference to wheat, when he said that the comparative price would be 94 cents a bushel. That was his figure.

I will state to the Senator, however, that I think there is grave doubt as to what expense will be involved in the administration of the bill in the event it becomes a law. By questioning the Secretary of Agriculture and other members of the Department, I sought to get them to give the committee an estimate of what it would cost to administer the proposed law. I have thus far been unable to get any reasonable or fair estimate from any source as to what the amount of the tax will be, or as to what it will cost to administer the bill in the event it becomes a law. I was merely anxious to know the source of the information of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield again?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Kansas has not furnished very accurate data in regard to the additional costs which will be imposed upon the consumers of the United States by reason of the pending bill. He has referred only to wheat. There have been brought within the terms of the bill a number of other so-called "basic commodities." I think that an increase in the prices of these commodities covered by the bill will be a billion dollars or more. That there should be an increase is admitted by all. I think the prices of the commodities of agriculture have been entirely too low, and I should be glad to see a material increase in the same, notwithstanding the fact that such an increase would entail a larger burden upon consumers. I am not complaining about an increase in commodity prices, and I am inclined to think that, with the amendments which have been made to the bill, there will be an increase in commodity prices, either by reason of this measure, or by inflationary or reflationary processes, or by the upturn in business, of considerably more than a billion dollars. I should hope that there would be an increase in agricultural commodity prices in an amount in excess of a billion dollars. I am only suggesting that there should be some limitation in the bill, if that can be done, upon the costs of administration. Experience has demonstrated that in the administration of a number of farm measures, as well as others, the costs have been entirely too great.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would suggest, as an addition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, the following language, "and a detailed statement of such expenses shall be submitted to the House and the Senate on the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December of each year by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. CLARK. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the modification.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

But the amount paid for administrative expenses (exclusive of refunds) in any year shall not exceed 5 percent of the amount of the proceeds of the taxes which will be collected during such year under this title, and a detailed statement of such expenses shall be submitted to the House and the Senate on the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December of each year by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am inspired to an expression at this hour by a headline which comes to us in the evening press. I am inspired because it is apparent that the truth is little by little sinking in. With the permission of the Senate, I read a headline appearing in the Evening Star of today:

President halts gold exports as counterdeflationary move; stocks and commodities soar.

Withdraws support of United States dollar in foreign exchanges to aid domestic markets.

This brings us back to what we had here last Monday, and what is written into every line of the pending bill, written into the pending amendment, written into every paragraph and sentence of the bill, and my thought was inspired by the assertion of the learned Senator from Utah as to how that would reflect on the consumer, and how the consumer would derive that which would be necessary from the consumer in order to bear the burden of this measure.

I care not by what avenue we may travel, it makes no difference what road we pursue, there is no question which more engrosses the minds of the Members of the Senate than this: How will the consumer pay?

It is all right to enact legislation, it is all right to say that there will be a tax, it is all right to say, as is said by the learned author of the bill—who, by the way, smiles every time I call him the author of the bill—"This is a glorious experiment." I prefer the word "glorious", because if there is anything on earth that is glorious, it is the farmer, and if there be a sentence in this bill which will give one word of encouragement to the farmers of America I am willing to support the bill. But even the author of the bill refuses to give sanction to the extent that there is a word of encouragement to any angle or development of agricultural pursuit within the lines of the bill. Nor have I heard one Senator, even the learned Senator from Alabama, say that he has confidence in this bill bringing back to the farm life of America the encouragement which the farm life of America wants, and I say in that respect that they do not want the prices of 1929.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not want to make a speech in the Senator's time, but I do not want the Senator, even by indirection, to misconstrue my position on this bill. If the Senator had been patient enough to listen to the various speeches I have made, I am sure he must have heard the repeated statement that I had great faith in the effectiveness of the administration of the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I want to direct a question to the Senator, which I hope may attract also the Senator from Alabama. Is it not a fact that the administration's policy today, in line with what some of us attempted a few days ago, which I am sorry the Senator from Alabama did not fall in line with soon enough to get part of the glory, has decided to come around to inflation in order to help the farmer, instead of depending upon this patchwork, silver-sea document?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may say that I did not want any glory in that connection. I occupied that position before the Senator from Louisiana ever got to the United States Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. It is only too bad that we could not have gotten the Senator to vote with us the other day, so that he could have had the continued glory. Nevertheless, I will share with him, for what it is worth, whatever glory I have acquired since I have gotten to the Senate.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate to any great extent. I have one or two thoughts which have come to me as the result of the headlines in the current press and as a result of the attention I have given to the bill.

There is no more chance for this bill to be successful than there was for another bill of a similar nature to be successful—and it was a colossal failure, as we all admit—unless we will give to those who must bear the burden, the consumers, something with which they can meet the unusual burdens which come out of legislation such as this. Give back to the poor the coin of the poor. Give back to the masses the coin of the masses. Give back to those who purchase that with which they have purchased from time immemorial. Four hundred million of human beings today across the Pacific are hungry to absorb a surplus which this Nation produces. Four hundred million in one country alone, and untold millions in another oriental country ask only for the opportunity to buy.

Do not Senators realize, notwithstanding the price we have placed on their medium of exchange, which is the market price from day to day of silver, that today China absorbs 21 percent of the flour of America? Do you know what it will mean if we will just place their medium of exchange on a common, ordinary, civilized basis, so that they may buy from America that of which America has a surplus?

We have a surplus of wheat, and we have a surplus of cotton. Let us admit that, although it is said we have not a surplus of peanuts. I regret exceedingly that the amendment of the learned Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has apparently been stricken out of the bill. I voted to put it in the bill. I will vote to put it back again, including any kind of a commodity which will bring back to those who toil something which they toil for. But we cannot bring back to the purchasing masses of America that which they desire unless we give them that with which they purchase.

It is said, however, that we cannot remonetize silver. It is said that we should not try to inflate. It is said that if we remonetize silver, we will destroy. Destroy what?

When we were a cradle nation, only in our swaddling clothes, we declared to the world that our medium of exchange should be gold and silver, and we fixed the parity of the two and the metallic content of each. We did that before we adopted the Constitution of the United States, and we did it after we adopted the Constitution of the United States; and until in 1870 Germany and England demonetized that of which we had a surplus and could supply to the world, it was the standard on a parity with which the poor could purchase; but in 1870 both Germany and England demonetized silver, and in 1873 they sent their envoys here and demonetized silver for us, and they are going to do it again.

Senators talk about an international conference. Who is coming here for the international conference? Ramsay MacDonald, the Premier of Great Britain, is coming for "conversations"; and the international conference will take place thereafter. I wonder if we ever won anything yet in an international conference? If we ever did, I have never heard of it. We can win the power of our courage but apparently we cannot win by the power of our tenacity to a principle.

We sent the greatest American that we ever had across the waters to carry out a great international principle, but when he got over there he was confronted with nationalists and he yielded the great international principle that was uppermost in America at that time, and which is uppermost in America now from the standpoint of heart, blood, and tradition. He yielded that for something else, and he came back and submitted it to the American people; and in 1920 they said, "We will carry out that which you say; it shall be a solemn referendum, solemnly submitted to a people"; and the solemn referendum was returned to him with the word "no." Let the solemn referendum go back to those who speak now while holding us on a gold standard with the solemn enunciation that America will never cancel her foreign debts, will never repudiate the position she occupies, and will never assume a place in the League of Nations.

However, that is aside from the question. The question now is: How will those represented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] pay the $2,000,000,000 that is about to be placed as a new tax upon their shoulders? Where will they acquire the money with which to buy? We took $500,000,000 from them just the other day; we took it from the consumers of this country, from the men who bared their breasts to the foe. We took $500,000,000 from them; but we did more than that: We took from them even the right of hospitalization; we took from them the right to have the ills and woes of which the flesh is heir treated under governmental supervision. We sent their widows and their orphans back again to wonder why the father of the family, the breadwinner, had gone at the mandate of his Nation; and at the same time we spend $500,000,000 to send those who, perhaps, never enlisted, who had no connection whatsoever with the Army that was organized between 1917 and 1919—we send them out under Army supervision for a dollar a day, and God knows for how long they may serve. The question, however, comes back to an assertion made by the learned Senator from Utah, that it will require $2,000,000,000 to administer this bill. If that statement be true—and that is what aroused my attention—this bill should go down to defeat; and I am going to vote for its defeat as long as that assertion stands unchallenged before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have had one of the legislative reference clerks draft an amendment similar to the one offered by the Senator from Missouri. I believe it is in little better form, and I think it comes in a better place in the bill. My amendment would come in on page 17, at the end of line 5, as a part of that clause, and provides:

But the amount paid for administrative expenses (exclusive of refunds) in any year shall not exceed 5 percent of the amount of the proceeds of the taxes which will be collected during such year under this title.

The words "exclusive of refunds" are included because, beginning with the paragraph at the bottom of page 16, in line 1, on page 17, it says:

Administrative expenses, including refunds under parts 1 and 2 of this title.

So I think that provision should be in the bill.

Mr. President, if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri, I should like to offer the amendment as a substitute for his amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, except that I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to my original amendment should be included in the proposed substitute.

Mr. FRAZIER. That should be included also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the parliamentary situation the only way to proceed would be for the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his amendment, since the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota comes at a different point in the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I am willing to do that if the Senator from North Dakota will include the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FRAZIER. I will be glad to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is withdrawn, and the clerk will report the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota as amended by the Senator from Florida.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 17, line 5, immediately before the period, it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

But the amount paid for administrative expenses (exclusive of refunds) in any year shall not exceed 5 percent of the amount of the proceeds of the taxes which will be collected during such year under this title, and a detailed statement of such expenses shall be submitted to the House and the Senate on the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December of each year by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I must submit to the consideration of the Senate the fact that as to the taxes to be collected there is a time limit and there is also authority for the extension of payments. The salaries and expenses will be running on and will be taken, of course, from such proceeds as may be collected. I cannot see how in an indefinite measure such as this we can definitely state any amount to be allotted for expenses. We do not know how many commodities will be included, and we do not know anything about the number of persons who may be employed to administer the proposed law.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator think there ought to be something definite about this bill?

Mr. SMITH. I would have liked to have the bill a little more definite than it is; but, since we have it, I want to make a statement I have not heretofore made.

The President of the United States, desiring to aid agriculture, submitted a draft to the representatives of the organized groups of farmers, if there are any organized groups of farmers. They got together and arranged this bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is not this the same group of farmers and farm-organization leaders that got together and arranged the Farm Board bill 4 years ago?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know about that; I am not going to enter into that at all. What I am going to say is that the Chief Executive called in the representatives of the farmers, so called—and perhaps they were—and they agreed on a certain form of legislation. That form of legislation was drafted by them with the aid of the man who was appointed Secretary of Agriculture; the draft was furnished to the Congress ready-made, and it was furnished with the endorsement of the administration. When it came before our committee I frankly admit that I was under the impression that certain modifications could be made with the approval of the administration, but the committee was advised that the bill, as was and is, was what was desired.

I want to state here that I am not going to subject my convictions to any man, but I will not throw any monkey wrenches in the machinery. I simply, as a loyal Democrat, and one loyal to the administration, am going to let this measure, so far as I am concerned, become a law, if possible. The responsibility is not upon me.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator think that the expenses of administration under this proposed act ought to exceed 5 percent of the processing tax which is to be collected?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know how the expenses will run; I do not know anything about it.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator think some limitation ought to be put in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. All that I know is that it is an untrod path, that it is an experiment, and that the President himself has said that if his attempt or the attempt of those whom he shall appoint to administer it proves a failure, he will withdraw it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. Just let me finish this statement, because I think it is due me to make it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Under those circumstances I would not interrupt the Senator for the world.

Mr. SMITH. I think it is due me and to the party to which I belong to have a clear, definite understanding of my relation to this measure. Had I had my way, I would have drafted a vastly different bill. It might not have been any better than the pending bill—I started to say "it could not have been any worse", but I will leave that out. [Laughter.] However, be the bill as it may, I am going to stand here, as I have stood, and deal as fairly with it as it is possible for me to deal with it, and I believe that every colleague I have on this floor will bear me out when I say I have dealt fairly and more than fairly under the circumstances.

Now we are going to attempt to set limitations by providing how much shall be allowed for expenses of administration. It may be like the first pocketbook I ever bought. I had 50 cents; I saw somebody have a pocketbook; I thought any man as rich as I was needed a pocketbook; so I went and spent 50 cents for a pocketbook, and then did not have anything to put in it, which nearly broke my heart. [Laughter.] I thought when I bought the pocketbook I would have the 50 cents to put in it, but the pocketbook cost 50 cents, and I had the pocketbook but no 50 cents. Of course, I do not know what the administration of this proposed act is going to cost, but I do plead with this body, with this bill as it is, to give the administration and the Department of Agriculture a free hand to work out this problem, which I would not undertake for all the money in America.

I am going to do my best to see that the bill, as nearly as may be, is passed as is, so far as the part they drafted is concerned. The part I drafted is fine, and nobody can deny that. [Laughter.] I had the compliment paid me the other day by a Senator who said that the upper part of the sandwich was good and the lower part of the sandwich was good, but the interior thereof was not so good. I plead with my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, and those on the other side as well, to take the bill as is and pass it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. May I ask the Senator one question? I understand the law to be that one who advises another to commit suicide is guilty of a crime. I wonder if the Senator has thought about that?

Mr. SMITH. I know there are some instances in which I would almost be willing to commit that crime if the one I advised would commit suicide! [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair request the occupants of the gallery not to make a demonstration of any kind. It is in violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it is not a very pleasant task at best, but I am tired of the insinuation being made that I am disloyal and not doing my duty.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMITH. I decline to yield just now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH. I not only have done my duty, but I think I am doing a little more perhaps. As the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] remarked once, there comes a time in the lives of men when they have to rise above principle. [Laughter.]

I do not want any mistake about this measure. There is not a man on the floor who does not understand the origin of the bill and the purpose of the bill. Why should we do other than what we ultimately are going to do—pass the bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. SMITH. Very well; I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. What is the unpleasantness of the Senator's task to which he refers?

Mr. SMITH. The unpleasantness of my task is that there is in the bill a whole portion of it that does not supply what I think is necessary to take care of the desperate condition of that class of people to which I belong and to whom I owe my first and last allegiance. That is it. But I am a loyal Democrat and a loyal party man. The President has asked for this bill to be passed, and, so far as I am concerned, it shall be done. The responsibility is not on me. In this emergency America is looking to him, and, thank God, up to the present time he has driven ahead. He may have made mistakes, but the whole world is applauding the fact that he is doing things. It may be that he will do some of them wrong, but he cannot do anything that is more wrong than the wrong that has been already done.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator mean by his expression that he places party fealty above the welfare of his people?

Mr. SMITH. No, Mr. President; I mean to say that when the psychology of the situation is such as it is, when the people believe that salvation will come from the President, then I believe in giving him my support. It would seem that if salvation is to come at all it must come from that source, because up to recently under the other administration we were only supposed to be led by the administration, but now we have a man who has pledged himself to redeem the situation, and I, for one, am not going to throw any monkey wrenches in the machinery. I am not going to set my opinion up against him. I am going to take my opinion and keep it to myself. I would not surrender, I would not be guilty of mental prostitution for any man; but I will step aside and let him try this plan, and God knows I wish it all success. I wish that he had been the author of the bill rather than making a promise which in my opinion more or less bound him. I am not going to undertake to describe those who are said to be the authors of the bill. I refrain from that. I think I could make a speech along that line very satisfactory to myself. But I do not want to see the bill made inoperative perhaps in any respect that might be chargeable to others than those who have assumed the responsibility.

Senators will remember that the bill was in the hands of the press before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had it. If any member of the committee had a copy of it before the press had it, let him speak out now. It was sent to the press verbatim, et literatim, et seriatim, before any one of us ever had a copy of it. Therefore, as to those who have assumed the responsibility, it is my intention and purpose that they shall bear it, and I hope it will succeed. So far as possible I am going to try to hold it in its integrity.

Mr. President, while I am still on my feet, I want to ask the Senate to remain in session tonight and let us drive ahead with the bill, because if there is any good to come to agriculture from it the time is rapidly passing when it can be of any benefit whatsoever this year. We know that the bill is going to pass. Why should we not expedite it and give it whatever chance there may be in it to be of benefit to the farmers? There are 1 or 2 sections of the bill or perhaps 3 that I really believe would be of actual benefit if they could be enacted into law. I believe the proposal which I submitted and which was passed would help. I believe the leasing plan would help. I believe the mortgage-relief plan, which did not emanate like the other sections of the bill, but came through the ordinary channels, would be of benefit even if not amended.

God knows and every man from the rural sections knows the horror with which the majority of farmers are facing tomorrow—mortgages being foreclosed, people being dispossessed. Of all the matters that may come before us, the one that should receive the serious consideration of every man here is that voiceless crowd that feed and clothe and shoe the world. We ought not really to experiment. We ought to gird ourselves and settle the question of the expansion of the currency which everybody knows is the foundation upon which any prosperity must rest.

I was interested to hear the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] read the headlines from the afternoon paper to the effect that we have put an embargo upon the exportation of gold, and that we perhaps are entering upon a revision of the contents of the gold dollar so that what we have might be expressed in more currency. What we need is more money with which to buy. That is fundamental. I heard the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] say today that what we need is more rapidity of movement of money. The difficulty is that it has moved so very fast during the last year or two that it went clear out of sight.

It is not so much the rapidity of circulation as it is the necessary volume of circulation. This bill and no other bill that we can pass will have a modicum of success in it unless there is the wherewith to make success possible. Suppose we were to raise the price of cotton and wheat without increasin the volume of currency. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said the other day, we would simply subtract from one element of the people their purchasing power and transfer it to another element, and would not increase the volume one particle. When we raise the price, we decrease the purchasing power and decrease the consumption and leave the farmer and consumer both in identically the same position as when we began.

Mr. President, I do not like to be goaded into making a speech. I prefer to feel like it when I get up to make a speech. I did not feel like it this afternoon. I have sat here patiently day after day, but I do plead with my colleagues to let us vote and get the bill into operation, or at least get it out of the Senate. I do not see any reason why we should not do so. I do not believe we can set any limitation on the expense of administration of the bill and say how much we shall pay or how much we shall not pay, because we do not know and cannot know what will be the necessary and proper amount.

Mr. President, I should like to have a vote on the amendment, and I sincerely hope that the amendment will not prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, as modified, will be restated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], as modified, is as follows:

On page 17, line 5, immediately before the period, insert a semicolon and the following:

"But the amount paid for administrative expenses, exclusive of refunds, in any year shall not exceed 5 percent of the amount of proceeds of the taxes which will be collected during such year under this title; and a detailed statement of such expenses shall be submitted to the House and the Senate on the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December of each year by the Secretary of Agriculture."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CLARK. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate; but it is perfectly apparent from the consideration of the subject that those charged with the administration of the bill will have no idea, or little idea—they will have no accurate information—as to the amount that they are at liberty to expend in a given year. They will make the expenditure first, and then they will ascertain afterward the amount they should have expended.

The amendment contemplates that the expenses of administering the act for any year shall not exceed 5 percent of the amount received from the taxes levied under the act during that year, so that the expenditures would have been incurred before it could be ascertained how much should be expended.

I do not object to a fair limitation on the expenditures.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does not this bill in itself set up machinery for estimating in advance the amount of the processing tax to be collected and appropriate that amount of money out of the Treasury?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The bill contemplates the imposition of a tax; but——

Mr. CLARK. I mean, machinery is set up in the bill itself for estimating the amount of taxes to be collected, and that amount is appropriated out of the Treasury.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think anyone can tell with approximate accuracy the amount of the tax that will be collected during the year. That cannot be told with respect to income taxes. Certainly it cannot be ascertained with respect to a processing tax when it is not known how much of the commodity is going to be processed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have concluded all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to call the Senator's attention to section (b) on page 17:

The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury shall jointly estimate from time to time the amounts currently required for such payments and expenses, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Secretary of Agriculture the amounts so estimated. The amount of any such advance shall be deducted from such funds as subsequently become available under subsection (a).

It seems to me it is just as easy to estimate the amount of the tax to be collected as it is to make that estimate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; I do not think that is true at all. I think the two Secretaries could make an estimate of the amount of expense they were going to incur in administering the act because they would probably know, after proceeding a little way, what agencies would be employed.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I hope we shall have a yea-and-nay vote on this matter. I think there is no reason why we should not make some restriction upon the expenditures.

The people of the country quite generally know—and I presume every Senator knows—that if we leave the floodgates open for the handling of public expenditures, there is always waste and extravagance and a preying upon the public money of the people of the country. We should, if possible, make some limitation on it. If these officials find they are in trouble by reason of the limitation, they can come to Congress and get additional funds. There is no reason why they should not come in with their balance sheets and demonstrate to Congress why they have expended more than 5 percent, that being the limitation. If it were done, then Congress would have an opportunity to pass upon this question.

I dare say that if, during the last 4 years, Congress had scrutinized the accounts and the expenditures of the various independent agencies and bureaus of the Government, even with the liberal spirit of many of our Senators, the American taxpayers would have been several million dollars better off than they are today. I do not think I would be extravagant in saying that they would be $25,000,000 better off if there had been more careful scrutiny of the expenditures.

Sooner or later, unless some corrections are made, we are going to have to go behind the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Fleet Corporation, the Shipping Board, and various other independent governmental agencies, and check them in their mad waste of the money of the taxpayers of America; and I think we might as well start off right with this agency.

I hope we shall have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], as modified. On that amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. COPELAND. Upon this question I have a pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are absent on official business:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE]; the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]; the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]; and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]; and

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE].

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. FRAZIER's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Missouri proposes the following amendment:

On page 16, line 5, insert a new paragraph, to be known as "paragraph (i) ", as follows:

" (i) The officers, agents, inspectors, and employees authorized by the terms of this act shall as far as possible be practical farmers, and the field of employment of such officers, agents, inspectors, and employees shall be limited to the congressional districts in which they reside."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table a resolution passed by the Legislature of Minnesota, in the form of a petition, referring to the pending bill.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Mike Holm, secretary of state of the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy with record of the original instrument in my office of H.F. No. 1954, being resolution no. 19, laws of Minnesota, 1933, filed in this office on the 15th day of April A.D. 1933, and that said copy is a true and correct transcript of said instrument and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in St. Paul, this 17th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL]

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Joint resolution to the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States concerning national legislation providing for refinancing of agricultural loans at lower rates of interest

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota—

Whereas an emergency exists in this State whereby large numbers of farmers therein have lost or are losing their life's earnings for failure to meet interest payments through no fault of their own, with present conditions and high interest rates continuing, that such an emergency will continue for an indefinite time unless remedied by national legislation, providing for refinancing of farm loans at lower interest rates;

Whereas due to the emergency now existing the interest of both borrowers and lenders on farm lands within this State are mutual, that interest rates are so high and price levels so low that borrowers are unable to pay existing rates, and lenders are unable to collect, due to the situation thus created; and

Whereas it is the desire of the legislature of this State that occupying farm owners be permitted to refinance farm loans at lower interest rates, making possible for them to remain in their homes and, inasmuch as there is now pending a refinancing bill in the Congress of the United States, which provides for administration, methods of financing, and reduction of interest rates to 4½ percent: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That we regard such rates as provided for in this refinancing measure as too high to be of sufficient value to the farmers of Minnesota at this time and therefore we urge the Congress of the United States to lower the interest rate provided for in this bill to 3 percent per annum.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
K. K. SOLBERG,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house of representatives the 11th day of April 1933.

FRANK T. STARKEY,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Passed the senate the 10th day of April 1933.

G. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved April 15, 1933.

FLOYD B. OLSON,
Governor of the State of Minnesota.

Filed April 15, 1933.

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in all human probability, the force to be employed in the administration of the proposed law will comprise a body of men larger than the Army and Navy of the United States combined, added to the reforestation army which has just been created.

We have all had some experience in the administration of laws by the various bureaus of the Government. Under the crop production law it has been customary to take citizens of South Carolina and send them to Missouri, where they know nothing about the crops which are produced, or to have citizens of Missouri sent to Colorado, or Oklahoma, or Texas, where they are unfamiliar with crop conditions.

I believe that the adoption of some such amendment as that I have offered is absolutely necessary in order to prevent a horde of college professors and theorists and carpetbaggers descending on the farm population of the United States. Certainly there is nothing unreasonable in asking that the proposed act be administered by practical farmers, men who know something about agricultural conditions, and that it be administered in the various localities by those living there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Missouri proposes the following amendment:

On page 7, line 2, after the word "payments", to add the following: "Provided, however, That during the year 1933 no land shall be leased for the purpose of reduction of acreage in any commodity except winter wheat sown for 1934."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the leasing of land for the purpose of reducing production which could not be used for production, anyhow. It is perfectly apparent to anybody that by the time this act can be passed and go back to the House and go through conference and the administrative machinery is set up, it will be too late to affect any crop to be planted this year, except winter wheat, which will be planted next fall for harvesting next year. While, of course, I realize that it is physically possible to plant cotton in some parts of the United States as late as June, nevertheless it is impossible to set up the machinery required in time to affect that crop. Moreover, the provisions of the bill which comprise the Smith bill passed by the Senate in the last Congress admirably meet the cotton-reduction problem for the present year. The whole purpose of my amendment is to prevent the squandering of public money in any such fashion.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, perhaps the major purpose of the bill is to have a reduction in acreage, even where planting has been completed this year. I have been in consultation with some of those who will be charged with the administration of the law, and am informed that arrangements may yet be made, even where certain crops have been planted, to have them abandoned in order to bring about the situation that is desired in the passing of this legislation.

If this amendment should be adopted now, it would make the proposed law, so far as this year is concerned, practically worthless. I do not see why those who have sown wheat or planted cotton and tobacco may not reduce their acreage under the rental or leasing system, with an advantage still to themselves, under the terms of the proposed leasing provision, which is to give them a certain amount for rental.

It is needless for me to call to the attention of men here who have read the bill to the fact that with this amendment in it the whole purpose of the bill would be practically nullified.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that in many of the cotton areas cotton can be planted up to the middle of June?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, Mr. President; all of those who are familiar with the cotton section of the country know that cotton may be planted up to the 15th of June, and even that which is planted now could be abandoned with profit, under the terms of the leasing plan, to which I referred a while ago. In my opinion, the leasing plan holds out more hope than almost any of the other propositions in the measure. The others may work out all right, but this would have its effect, not on the part of the commodity domestically consumed but on the market price of the whole commodity. I do not think we ought to limit it if the bill is to have its greatest effect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that if this amendment is adopted, it will limit the application of the bill to the allotment plan on everything but wheat. It would exclude the application of the rental and leasing plan from every other commodity in the bill except wheat. I do not know of a single Senator from the Cotton Belt, from the real cotton States, who favors the proposition. As the Senator from South Carolina has stated, the most hopeful plan, so far as cotton is concerned, at least, with its very large exportable surplus, is the use of the leasing plan, and this amendment proposes to prevent that, and force the allotment plan if any plan at all is used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and vote "nay."

Mr. ADAMS (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. ADAMS. Having a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia, and not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BARKLEY. My colleague [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. My colleague is unavoidably absent. I do not know how he would vote if present and voting.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]; and

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are absent on official business: Mr. BAILEY, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. GLASS, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. POPE, Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. WHEELER.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 57, as follows:

So, Mr. CLARK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Missouri proposes the following amendment:

On page 7, line 2, after the word "payments", to insert: "Provided further, That the provisions of this part authorizing the leasing of land for the purpose of acreage reduction shall be limited to 2 years from the date of the approval of this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer this amendment in the hope that during the next 2 years the situation may become so changed by reason of reciprocal trade arrangements and the opening up of our export market that the Government will be glad to abandon the whole theory of marginal acreage leasing. I believe it is very essential that this system, which, after all, is nothing more nor less than a dole, should have a time limit, so that, if it is to be continued, affirmative action will be necessary to continue it rather than affirmative action being necessary to discontinue it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to call attention to the fact that this proposed law will be subject to termination at any time by the President and will be subject to automatic termination when the prices of commodities have risen to those of the base period selected; and if there should occur such a rise in commodities as that, the parity which existed in 1909–14 would be reestablished, the whole measure will become inoperative, so that the only necessity for the bill is the situation now existing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the administration and those who are interested in a measure which I had the honor to submit and have passed have perfected arrangements as to securing the cotton from the different governmental agencies. I send to the desk an amendment to part 1, beginning with section 3 on page 3 and going down to section 4 on line 6, and I ask that it may be substituted for the part of the bill beginning on page 3, section 3, and going down to the end of line 5 on page 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, beginning in line 9, it is proposed to strike out down to and including line 5 on page 4, being section 3, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

PART 1. COTTON-OPTION CONTRACTS

SEC. 3. The Federal Farm Board and all departments and other agencies of the Government, not including the Federal intermediate credit banks, are hereby directed—

(a) To sell to the Secretary of Agriculture, at such price as may be agreed upon, not in excess of the market price, all cotton now owned by them.

(b) To take such action and to make such settlements as are necessary in order to acquire full legal title to all cotton on which money has been loaned or advanced by any department or agency of the United States, including futures contracts for cotton or which is held as collateral for loans or advances, and to make final settlement of such loans and advances as follows:

(1) In making such settlements with regard to cotton, including operations to which such cotton is related, such cotton shall be taken over by all such departments or agencies other than the Secretary of Agriculture at a price or sum equal to the amounts directly or indirectly loaned or advanced thereon and outstanding, including loans by the Government department or agency and any loans senior thereto, plus any sums required to adjust advances to growers to 90 percent of the value of their cotton at the date of its delivery in the first instance as collateral to the department or agency involved, such sums to be computed by subtracting the total amount already advanced to growers on account of pools of which such cotton was a part from 90 percent of the value of the cotton to be taken over as of the time of such delivery as collateral, plus unpaid accrued carrying charges and operating costs on such cotton, less, however, any existing assets of the borrower derived from net income, earnings, or profits arising from such cotton, and from operations to which such cotton is related, all as determined by the department or agency making the settlement.

(2) The Secretary of Agriculture shall make settlement with respect to cotton held as collateral for loans or advances made by him on such terms as in his judgment may be deemed advisable, and to carry out the provisions of this section, is authorized to indemnify or furnish bonds to warehousemen for lost warehouse receipts and to pay the premiums on such bonds.

When full legal title to the cotton referred to in (b) has been acquired it shall be sold to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purposes of this section in the same manner as provided in (a).

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to purchase the cotton specified in paragraphs (a) and (b).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I notice that by this amendment there seem to be added to the original bill certain charges; that is to say, the original bill provided for payment of loans and the expense of carriage but did not include advancements to growers up to 90 percent of the value of their cotton, and so forth, as set forth in the amendment. Then I notice that it provides for a deduction, which is not contained in the original draft of this measure, of such profits as may have been made in the handling of the cotton that is the subject matter of the amendment. What I should like to ask the learned Senator in charge of the bill is what the net cash effect of the amendment will be; that is, will it increase the burden which the Government must carry in order to put the transaction through as designed, or will it diminish that burden?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it will diminish the burden nearly $14,000,000. The original provision only covered the quantity of cotton that was actually handled, or is actually now in existence, pledged against certain loans; but there were certain items which the new members of the Farm Board insisted should be returned to them rather than retained by the cooperatives. This amendment was drafted in conjunction with Mr. Morgenthau, who insisted that the amount of money still held by the cooperatives because of the transactions which had taken place in the handling of the cotton should in the settlement be returned as part of the revolving fund. The amendment increases the amount the Government will get somewhere between thirteen and a half and fourteen million dollars.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the amount in the form of loans outstanding against this cotton, if the Senator can state the figures approximately?

Mr. SMITH. I do not recall, but I know that as to the stabilization cotton there was a considerable amount of money lost, something like 50 million or 60 million dollars, as I recall, but this is cotton that was held for the grower on which he received 90 percent of the market value at that time. He sustains a loss because he only got 90 percent of the market price, and, of course, the Government has lost as well as he, but the cooperatives through the A.C.C.A., I believe, as it is called, accumulated 14 million or 15 million dollars by their transactions in the sale of their cotton, which Mr. Morgenthau insisted should be returned. This amendment, therefore, was drafted to take the place of the provision proposing a simple settlement for the cotton that was held and for the amount due on it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Assuming that on February 28, 1933, the total outstanding on account of the advancements was $68,900,000 plus, does the Senator know how much must be added to that on account of carrying charges?

Mr. SMITH. The carrying charges are going to be added to the price of the cotton that is going to be sold under this option plan, so that the carrying charges will stop at the time the transaction is made with the farmer.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will be so kind as to allow one other question——

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Assuming that those carrying charges are $2,000,000, that would make approximately $71,000,000 altogether. Does the Senator understand that under his amendment the amount which would be borne by the United States Government as a loss in this transaction would be approximately $57,000,000 instead of $71,000,000?

Mr. SMITH. Under this amendment there will be a saving as against the original provision, as I said a moment ago, of something between $13,000,000 and $14,000,000. I do not remember the exact figure, but the settlement is intended to recover whatever assets in cash the cooperatives have. Nothing else can be recovered, because we take all the cotton. Then when the Government disposes of the cotton on option to the farmer, the carrying charges up to date are to be added to the price the Government has to pay, plus the insurance and storage, the farmer to receive whatever profit there may be.

Mr. AUSTIN. Just another question, if the Senator will yield for it.

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator understand that the saving arises out of the limitation of 90 percent or is some of it to be ascertained by the deduction of profits? That is a matter that is not clear from the way the amendment is drafted.

Mr. SMITH. No; whatever profits have accrued under this amendment will be covered into the Farm Board's revolving fund. That is the difference between this and the old amendment. I was of the opinion that as to the cotton that had been put up as collateral, the amount that had been borrowed ought to be returned as far as the cotton would return it, but no further. They had made some profits and therefore they took those, and under this amendment the Government recovers that amount in excess of what it would under my amendment. In other words, it is very similar to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] when the matter was up before.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then the net cost to the Government, if the amendment is agreed to, will be approximately $57,000,000?

Mr. SMITH. I do not remember just what it was, but the loss will be the absolute difference between the price of the cotton at the time it was stored and at the present date.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber when the Senator from South Carolina offered his amendment. May I inquire whether it relates to the subject covered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] a few days ago?

Mr. SMITH. It is a little more drastic than that. Mr. Morgenthau and these parties got together, and he insisted that whatever profits they had should be turned over into the revolving fund. Of course, when they agreed, I accepted it, because that was the basis upon which any settlement was possible.

Mr. KING. Would the amendment just now offered be in harmony with the amendment which I have in mind to offer, namely:

Provided further, That in any settlement made by the Federal Farm Board for an amount in excess of the market value of the cotton, all earnings, profits, and commissions of any borrower resulting, directly or indirectly, from the handling of the cotton so required shall first be applied against the indebtedness of such borrowers to the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Morgenthau asked the conference. The leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and I went in to the conference, and then the Mississippi long-staple people came in, and they all agreed and finally submitted that the profits be turned over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]? I have here a statement emanating from the Farm Board which shows that as of February 28, 1933, the American Cotton Cooperative Association owed the Farm Board $71,015,748.31. Ten million dollars of this sum is the effective merchandising loan used for its current operations. Of the balance, $61,015,748.31, $60,424,979.72 is outstanding on the 1930–31 operations.

The difference of $590,768 is for miscellaneous loans to the American Cotton Cooperative Association, the most of which has been reloaned to the cotton associations that are stockholder members of the American Cotton Association. It is estimated at this time that if the 1930–31 operations of the American Cotton Cooperative Association were entirely liquidated, the loans of $60,424,979 could be decreased by about $3,375,000, indicating a deficit of about $57,000,000 to the Farm Board as of February 28, 1933.

That is not all, however. On the next page of the statement reference is made to another corporation to which loans were made, known as the "Staple Cotton Cooperative Association", which owed the Farm Board $11,517,257. One million dollars of this total represented an advance of the Farm Board.

But that is not all. As of February 28, 1933, the Cotton Stabilization Corporation owed the Federal Farm Board $97,530,238.40. Upon the liquidation of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation it is estimated that about $94,000,000 will still be unpaid to the Farm Board.

As a matter of fact, the Government will have lost, or has lost up to date, more than $150,000,000 in its operations upon the cotton exchange and in its dealings with the stabilization corporation and the American Cotton Cooperative Association, of which it was the parent.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator think the Government got off pretty luckily?

Mr. KING. The Government had an investment of $500,000,000 in the Farm Board. If it gets off with a loss of no more than $400,000,000, I think it will be very lucky. That experiment will cost the Government, before it is fully liquidated, in my opinion, at least $400,000,000.

Mr. GORE. If the Government would only learn the lesson which those figures teach, would it not be worth the money?

Mr. KING. The Senator knows there is one thing that history teaches, and that is that people learn nothing from history.

Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD at this point a statement showing some of the transactions of the Farm Board and its progeny.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

In considering the proposed amendment it is important first of all to understand just what amounts of obligations will be canceled under the present language of the bill. According to an announcement made by Mr. Morgenthau, Chairman of the Federal Farm Board, on March 21, 1933, the American Cotton Cooperative Association owed the Farm Board $71,015,748.31. If these loans were wiped out, there would be a deficit to the Farm Board of about $57,000,000.

The American Cotton Cooperative Association, according to the testimony of Mr. Creekmore before the Senate Agricultural Committee, is a Delaware corporation; it has an authorized capital of $30,000,000, of which $79,500 was paid in in cash by the 11 State cooperative associations affiliated with it. The 11 State cooperative associations which contributed the $79,500 capital, probably from loans theretofore received from the Farm Board, are as follows:

Alabama Farm Bureau Cotton Association, Montgomery, Ala.; Mid-South Cotton Growers Association, Memphis, Tenn; Georgia Cotton Growers Cooperative Association, Atlanta, Ga.; Louisiana Cotton Cooperative Association, Lake Providence, La.; Mississippi Cooperative Cotton Association, Jackson, Miss.; North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association, Raleigh, N.C.; Oklahoma Cotton Growers Association, Oklahoma City, Okla.; South Carolina Cotton Cooperative Association, Columbia, S.C.; Southwestern Irrigated Cotton Growers Association, El Paso, Tex.; Texas Cotton Cooperative Association, Dallas, Tex.; and California Cotton Cooperative Association, Bakersfield, Calif.

In addition to the $57,000,000 debt which will be canceled for the American Cotton Cooperative Association, Mr. Morgenthau states in his release that an additional loss of $8,254,350.07 will be suffered as a result of loans to the Staple Cotton Cooperative Association. This association operates in the Delta of the Mississippi and has approximately 3,500 members. So that the Treasury would simply make a gift of approximately $2,500 to each of the members of this organization.

In the summer of 1929, when the Farm Board operations were begun, the Staple Cotton Cooperative Association was the only cooperative which was in a solvent condition. It had reserves of approximately $500,000. At first it refused to borrow any money from the Farm Board. Nevertheless, it carried a large amount of cotton futures over from the 1928–29 season and, as a result of price declines, found itself in a precarious condition and was compelled to resort to the Federal Farm Board. It followed the same policy in 1930–31 under a contract with the Farm Board to carry the cotton or the futures until July 31, 1933. As a result, it lost not only its reserve of $500,000 but some $8,000,000 for the Federal Treasury.

None of the short-staple State cooperatives who are interested in the American Cotton Cooperative Association were in a satisfactory condition at the time the Farm Board came into existence. The Tennessee, Mississippi, and Arkansas cooperatives were, frankly, insolvent. The Oklahoma association was heavily in debt and could be saved only by a rise in prices. The Texas Cotton Cooperative Association had lost practically all its reserves speculating in the price of cotton in 1928–29. In testifying before the House Committee on Appropriations, in 1930, Mr. Legge, at that time chairman of the Farm Board, could name only the Staple Cotton Cooperative Association as a really successful cotton cooperative, and it soon succumbed to the lure of speculation.

The same old leadership which piloted the various State cooperatives into bankruptcy took charge of the American Cotton Cooperative Association upon its formation. U. B. Blalock, its president, had been connected with the North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association; C. O. Moser, vice president in charge of lobbying activities, had been president of the American Cotton Growers Exchange, which was a loose association of the various State cooperatives; D. G. Hill, Jr., comptroller of American Cotton Cooperative Association, had been connected with it. The list of directors and officials shown at page 400 of the November 1931 hearings reveals the fact that the same group who had previously fattened at the expense of the farmer were beneficiaries at the expense of the Federal Treasury.

In 1929–30 the Federal Farm Board issued a statement that the price of cotton was too low. It authorized the cooperatives to make advances of 16 cents upon cotton and such advances were made. This policy was intended for two purposes: First, to get farmers to deliver their cotton to the cooperatives; and second, in the belief that the price of cotton could be held up. If cotton had risen in value as was expected by the Board and its experts, the cotton cooperatives and their members would have received the benefit of the rising prices. When cotton declined, the Board created the Cotton Stabilization Corporation, which took over not only the cotton upon which the cooperatives had made the 16-cent advances, but cotton carried over from the previous seasons at prices substantially above the market. In the course of this operation the Farm Board also demanded delivery upon futures contracts for the months of May and July in New York and conducted a highly manipulative near corner in those months to the great injury of members of the trade who were compelled to hedge their cotton in order to avoid speculation.

Some 1,300,000 bales were thus taken over at prices which, according to the Oklahoma cooperative publications, were 5 cents above the market. The Government thus took over a loss approximating $30,000,000 from cooperative associations and their new marketing agency, the American Cotton Cooperative Association.

1930–31 OPERATIONS OF THE AMERICAN COTTON COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

Having had all their debts paid up at the end of the 1929–30 season the group of cotton cooperatives associated under the American Cotton Cooperative Association entered into a new scheme to secure members and stabilize prices. They offered to advance in cash 90 percent of the value of cotton, and according to the testimony of Mr. Moser, told the cotton farmer that if cotton went up they would get the profit, while if it went down the United States Treasury would take the loss. As a result they secured 2,100,000 bales. At the time a definite contract was entered into between the American Cotton Cooperative Association and the Federal Farm Board under which the Farm Board agreed to finance the holding of this cotton for a period of 3 years.

Since a heavy loss resulted, the American Cotton Cooperative Association is now insisting that this was in fact a stabilization operation and that the loss should again be transferred to the Federal Treasury. Since the cooperatives were for the most part insolvent at the time the Federal Farm Board was organized and since their operations had not resulted in the accumulation of any capital, unless by mere bookkeeping, it is plain that a large part of this loss must fall on the Federal Treasury. If the loss is to be canceled, profits arising from the same transaction should be credited against the loss.

There is nothing in the Agricultural Marketing Act authorizing the Federal Government to give money to the cooperatives and it seems to us as illegal to do this indirectly as to do it directly.

Whatever profits were made by the American Cotton Cooperative Association in 1930–31 can only have resulted from handling the cotton which they are now trying to sell to the Government at $65,000,000 in excess of its value. In addition, Manager Creekmore testified that some 1,300,000 bales of this cotton was sold and replaced with futures. He further stated that some 500,000 bales of 1931–32 cotton were to be converted into this 1930–31 pool. In view of the fact that several members of the American Cotton Cooperative Association suffered tremendous losses in buying cotton in 1931–32 it may be that this overgraded cotton found its way into the 1930–31 pool, thus transferring the loss to an operation which it is contended is for account of the Government.

In 1930–31, according to Mr. Carl Williams, the American Cotton Cooperative Association set up net earnings of $2,074,292.

These profits and any additional amounts held by the American Cotton Cooperative Association as a result of the operation which caused this $63,000,000 loss it is believed arose as follows:

1. A deduction or a commission was charged the State cooperatives by A.C.C.A. This amounted to about $1 per bale on the 2,100,000 bales accumulated.

2. In selling out spots and in buying and selling futures on the cotton exchanges it has been possible for A.C.C.A. to write into the $63,000,000 loss the full rate of future commissions by charging them to the State cooperatives keeping for the A.C.C.A. half of these charges by reason of Mr. Creekmore's membership in the exchange.

3. Through transfers of cotton from one pool to another, or from one year to another, or from spots to futures, and vice versa, A.C.C.A. has probably placed in its reserve commissions and profits directly made from these transfers.

4. A.C.C.A. has charged the State cooperatives 4 percent on money advanced to them which it has borrowed at rates as low as one fourth of 1 percent from the Farm Board.

It has been claimed that the loans referred to were for the purpose of stabilizing the cotton market.

In its special report to Congress, dated December 7, 1932 (p. 7), the Board expressly states that the loans involved were not made for the purpose of stabilizing cotton prices. They were made to get cotton farmers to deliver cotton to the cooperatives by promising them the profits and assuring them that Uncle Sam would certainly never ask them to bear the losses in spite of the direct terms of the written contract with the Board.

The only justification for canceling any of these loans is that they are not collectible. As a matter of fact, if the slate of the cooperatives is thus wiped clean and they are left without debts, they will be in a much better position than they were when the Farm Board started operations. Their accumulated debts were already paid out of the treasury of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation in 1930. And it is nothing but justice that the A.C.C.A. should not be permitted to throw all the losses on the Treasury and pile up bookkeeping profits, which it says must not be touched.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment which the Senator from South Carolina has tendered, it contemplates that the A.C.C.A., which is Mr. Creekmore's child, from which he has derived great benefits, will be required to turn back in this settlement to the revolving fund of the Farm Board whatever profits or assets it now has, amounting to between $5,000,000 and $13,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. I do not remember the figures, but somewhere between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator from South Carolina for giving us that much of a concession, because it is known that Creekmore, Moser, and others for a long time have been anxious to hang on to that fund as a basis for continued operations. If Mr. Morgenthau understands the facts, as I hope he does, he will sever all relations with the A.C.C.A. and compel its liquidation.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose the Senator is thoroughly aware of the fact that Mr. Morgenthau has already given out the statement that all activities looking toward advancing the farmer in every shape and form will be concentrated under one head. Just what is to be the form of the concentration I do not know, but I do hope that it is now in process of consummation.

Mr. KING. I think the President is to be congratulated upon taking this important forward step. I feel sure that Mr. Morgenthau, with his great ability, will effect reforms that will be highly advantageous to the Government and to the people.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if the results of his investigation of these figures have convinced him that the amendment does actually save to the Government approximately $15,000,000 which under the original draft of the measure it would have had to lose?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have not had time to examine the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, but knowing his interest in the matter and his fairness I assume that the amendment which he has offered carries out exactly the statement which he has made. From my understanding of the fund in the hands of the A.C.C.A. and the assets of that organization, there is approximately from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000. The Senator from South Carolina suggests to me sotto voce that it is about $12,000,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. The reason for my interrogatory was not to raise a question of accuracy with the Senator but to try to settle upon the figures. The figures which the Senator from Utah gave are not quite the same as I myself obtained from the Federal Farm Board. What I desire is merely to have the RECORD show an answer to the question whether his figures tend to show that situation. My own figures show a saving of $15,300,000, and I want to know if he can reconcile his figures to that amount of savings?

Mr. KING. I have not attempted to ascertain the savings that would result from the adoption of the amendment from the funds or assets in the possession of the A.C.C.A. I doubt whether anybody can tell definitely what the funds are, but I believe the figures which I gave as to the losses are accurate if I may accept the statement submitted by the Federal Farm Board under date of March 22, 1933. That statement, as I understand, was given out by Mr. Morgenthau after he had made an investigation of the condition of the Farm Board on the date indicated. As to what profits had been made and are in the hands of the A.C.C.A. I am not able to state. I doubt whether the information is available except as a result of a meticulous examination of the books of that organization.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is not the saving to which I was referring. I was referring to the saving that would be made to the Government by the adoption of the amendment as against the passage of the original draft of the bill. That is what I mean.

Mr. KING. The only savings that will be made, if I understand the amendment, will result from taking possession of the assets of the A.C.C.A. What those assets are I do not know. I have been told that some investigations indicate that the assets consist of cash and bills receivable, the aggregate value of which would be approximately $13,000,000. Of course, Mr. Creekmore and Mr. Moser and those who were greatly interested in that organization want to hold on to that $13,000,000 and to perpetuate the organization and to integrate it with any agency that may be formed under the direction of Mr. Morgenthau, so that that organization may continue as the agent of any Federal agency that may take the place of the Farm Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], on page 3, beginning in line 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to perfect the text in one respect. It will take only a moment. On page 4, line 18, section 6, between the words "into" and "contract", I move to insert the word "option", as this is an optional matter. That word was evidently omitted by oversight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers the following amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 18, after the word "into", insert the word "option", so as to read, "to enter into option contracts with the producers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. On page 4, line 20, I move to strike out the words "equivalent in amount to" and substitute "to be agreed upon, not in excess of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, those are all the amendments that I have ready at this time so far as that part of the bill is concerned, except that on page 6, beginning with the words "Provided further", on line 8, I desire to have the balance of that paragraph stricken out. It reads:

Provided further, That he is authorized to sell unlimited amounts at any time a price equivalent to not less than 10 cents, basis middling, ⅞ inch staple, at the ports can be procured.

In view of the bill in its entirety, and the prospects for better prices, both the Department and those interested think that that proviso ought to be stricken from the bill; and I ask that that amendment be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rose to propound a question to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The Senator detailed the financial operations of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation and the American Cotton Cooperative Association. As I understood his figures, the Farm Board, through its loans to those two concerns, took an aggregate loss of $150,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that is my understanding; and I am not sure whether there was not an additional loss of approximately $20,000,000 which the Farm Board sustained by reason of having paid, before the Stabilization Corporation or the A.C.C.A. was formed, some of the outstanding obligations of some of these so-called "cooperatives."

Mr. GORE. Oh, well, I would not be concerned about a mere $20,000,000; but is it for that that Mr. Creekmore receives $75,000 a year?

Mr. KING. It was for the very valuable services which he rendered in bringing about that great deficit.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it seems that the cotton people were less lucky than the wheat people in their dealings with the Farm Board, or else that the wheat people were better financiers than the cotton borrowers from the Farm Board.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. CLARK. It is true that the head of the wheat cooperatives received only $50,000 instead of $75,000; but there were two of those salaries—one of $50,000 and the other of $35,000—so that the aggregate of the wheat salaries was more than the cotton salary.

Mr. GORE. And I suppose the success was in inverse proportion to the salaries, perhaps.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORE. But the wheat people were pretty lucky; and at this point I wish to insert in the RECORD a brief statement concerning the dealings between the National Grain Corporation and the Farm Board.

The Farm Board lent that concern $16,000,000. That loan was refinanced, on the 9th day of last July, for a period of 10 years, at a rate of interest amounting to one eighth of 1 percent per annum. In other words, the National Grain Corporation was refinanced for $16,000,000 at an annual cost of $20,000—$20,000 a year for a period of 10 years—on a loan amounting to $16,000,000. At the rate of interest recently paid by the Government on one of its financial operations—4 and 4¼ percent—it cost the taxpayers of this country $650,000 a year to service that loan to the National Grain Corporation.

A great many people in this country are engaged in private business, the business of handling and merchandising grain. They have adventured their time, their talents, and their capital in that business. When they borrow $16,000,000 to carry on business in competition with the National Grain Corporation it costs them $950,000 a year, against the $20,000 a year which the National Grain Corporation pays to the Government of the United States for $16,000,000. That is an instance of governmental financing toward these specially favored concerns.

This resulted from a clause in the Farm Marketing Act which provided that these loans could be refinanced at the lowest rate of interest of any Government obligation still current and outstanding. Last summer the Government floated a loan at one eighth of 1 percent interest per annum. These financiers took advantage of the psychological moment and refinanced this $16,000,000 for 10 years at that rate of interest—one eighth of 1 percent a year. The contract was entered into on the 9th day of last July. I have a copy of the contract but will not encumber the RECORD with it; but I thought this statement ought to stand here in order to illuminate this character of financial operations.

Mr. President, while I am on the floor, on page 13, line 16, I move to strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert the figures "$7,500." The purpose of the amendment is to reduce from $10,000 a year to $7,500 a year the possible salaries which can be paid by the Secretary of Agriculture to such experts as Mr. Creekmore and the Reverend Mr. Hough, who is the head of the National Grain Corporation and a great financier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$7,500" so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided, That no salary in excess of $7,500 per annum shall be paid to any officer, employee, or expert of the Emergency Agricultural Adjustment Administration—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in justice to the committee and the hearing we had, I desire to make a statement; and then, of course, the Senate will vote as it sees fit.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in a personal appearance before us, stated that in the discharge of the very onerous burden which is about to be placed upon him he had to have men of the very best expert training that he could get. Remember, the original bill contained a provision that not more than a certain limited number of persons should receive salaries in excess of $10,000. The salaries of that limited number, of course, would exceed the $10,000. The committee, after consideration, compromised on placing in the bill the provision that is now there, that they should not receive in excess of $10,000. It was represented to the committee that men of the desired character, training, and ability could not be obtained for a less amount.

I make that statement because I think it is due to the Senate to know that the Secretary appeared in person and made a very strenuous plea for such salaries as would command the very best talent that could be obtained along the lines necessary to discharge the duties resting upon him.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I was not familiar with the legislative history of this provision. I did not know that the Secretary of Agriculture had made a special and personal appeal that the sum of $10,000 be inserted. My motion to strike it out, therefore, cannot be regarded as any evidence of disrespect toward the Secretary or toward his wishes.

But, Mr. President, Mr. Creekmore was paid $75,000 a year; and his operations alone have resulted in a loss of some hundreds of millions of dollars to the Farm Board. One of the wheat masters received $50,000 a year. Their operations have hardly been more successful. The services of a public official cannot always be measured by the amount of his salary.

This salary of $10,000 is more than Senators receive. The services these men are expected to render may be more valuable; they may call for more experience and a higher degree of talent and business experience. I am not willing to deny that. On the other hand, I am not willing to admit it. So, with the utmost respect toward the Secretary of Agriculture, I shall allow my motion to go to a vote.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, being somewhat familiar with the operations of the Farm Board and with its officers, it is nothing but justice to a man who cannot speak in this body, and whom I have known only casually, that I should say that Mr. Creekmore stated that his salary was $25,000, and that the remaining $50,000 was a commission upon the amount of cotton he handled and the business done. As for the wheat man, I am totally unadvised as to that.

Again, Mr. President, let me make this statement in reference to the Farm Board, the confirmation of some of whose members I opposed here, and my estimation of their ability to handle the work of the Board was more than borne out by the subsequent results. Let me state, however, that the losses that were sustained by the operations of the Farm Board were not due entirely to the inability or the impracticability or the lack of business acumen of these men. It was an unfortunate period, and everything suffered; and even men of long business experience failed as disastrously as did the Farm Board. We, as representatives of the people, ought to take into account every possible element that might go to ameliorate what has been universally condemned as a most disastrous failure.

I hold no brief for the Farm Board. None of the splendid advice that I gave them was ever taken. [Laughter.] They might have failed even worse than they did had they taken it. I wanted to say so much, however, in partial defense, at least, of men who have no way of defending themselves here, even if they need it. I know, as all of us know, that the terrible depression made success impossible, and that the compensation that has been accredited to Mr. Creekmore as a salary was in part a commission. He received so much per bale for the amount of cotton he handled, in conjunction with what I consider a tremendous and exorbitant salary, even at $25,000.

I thought it was due the Farm Board, and the men themselves, that I should make that statement.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as I understand—and I do not reflect on Mr. Creekmore as a citizen; perhaps I ought not to impeach him as a financier—he was receiving about $12,000 a year before he was advanced to this post at $25,000 fixed salary and a commission, as I recall, of a nickel a bale on the amount of cotton he handled. Neither do I wish to take advantage of the silence or the absence of gentlemen who cannot speak for themselves. This disaster has been universal and has been unsparing. It could not, perhaps, have been foreseen by the most foresighted; and yet panics and depressions have occurred in the past. If this were the first in human history there would be a still greater excuse for the members of the Farm Board not foreseeing and anticipating the disaster. But the Senator from South Carolina perhaps knows that a member of the Farm Board and certain of his associates worked out a theorem on cotton by which they could foretell the course of cotton prices in the years to come. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will give me his attention. He may not know that, and yet he may know it.

Mr. SMITH. I did not catch what the Senator said.

Mr. GORE. A member of the Farm Board and certain of his associates worked out a theorem by which they could forecast and foretell the course of cotton prices in the years to come. It was an infallible scheme; they could not lose. They put faith in their theory, and when cotton farmers in Oklahoma ordered their spot cotton sold at 19 and a fraction cents, cooperative officials, having faith in this theorem, bought futures at 19 and a fraction on the theory that cotton was going to 24 cents a pound, and they wanted to make the difference, to enjoy the profit.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether that was the same astute individual who recommended plowing up every third row of cotton?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator is a mindreader. I believe that a salary of $7,500, in view of our policy of retrenchment and economy, will command a pretty high order of talent; and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move to strike out "$10,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$8,500." That is the salary which Senators receive under the new regime, and let us not admit that these people are entitled to greater pay than Senators are. I appeal to the self-respect of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether or not he found, in his inquiry, that even the heads of most of the independent governmental agencies received net salaries not in excess of $8,500?

Mr. GORE. I am not sure I understood the Senator's question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I make the statement that the independent governmental agencies, as a rule, pay at the present time net salaries of not in excess of about $8,500—that is, to the members of the boards, such institutions as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Power Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission. So, if we should restrict these employees to salaries not in excess of that figure, certainly I do not think we would be doing them any injustice, and as far as the American people are concerned I am sure they would feel we were endeavoring to do justice by the taxpayers of the United States by placing this limitation in the bill, as proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator whether or not whatever salary is fixed would be subject to the economy law as to reductions? I do not know, and I am asking for information.

Mr. GORE. I do not know; and I think it is well that the question is propounded. Perhaps someone who does know will be good enough to answer.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, there is no provision in the bill covering that point, and I presume these people, being officers of the Government, would automatically come under the economy law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, unless the economy law expressly provides that it shall affect salaries hereafter created or authorized it probably would not have relation to the salaries mentioned here.

Mr. GORE. That was my impression, but I did not feel justified in making the statement. I think the Farm Board has paid one of its attorneys $25,000 a year, and I believe we have stricken some 600,000 soldiers off the rolls and have stricken down their pay some $400,000,000. I have an idea, perhaps, that we could get one of those soldiers who would be willing to serve for $8,500, the salary we pay ourselves. While it may be true that these officials deserve more than Senators, I just do not want to admit it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Oklahoma think that the thing which sometimes induces Members of the Senate to become Members of this body is not necessarily the question of compensation, but the publicity and the notoriety and the honor which are supposed to go along with the office, whereas any of these others who serve in other capacities do not enjoy the sunshine of fame and the publicity which beats constantly upon our heads; and does not the Senator think that ought to be taken into consideration in determining whether we should restrict everybody to the same salaries we get?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there may be some weight in the Senator's observation. I do not know just what the value is of the white light which beats upon the throne. The Senator used the word " notoriety ", and I think probably he did so advisedly, and I am not disposed to dispute it. Perhaps those gentlemen to whom I have referred would be willing to serve in this body at a lesser salary than $8,500. I think they will all rejoice to get salaries of $8,500. If we are obliged to deny ourselves the benefit of their services, I hope their services will not prove indispensable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, constantly we are referring here to the fact that nobody else ought to get any more than we get, implying that there is nobody else in the country whose services are worth as much as ours. I do not think that is a fair criterion by which to go, because there are certain compensations which are not considered in terms of dollars and cents that go along with membership in a legislative body, which do not attach to the quiet exclusion which sometimes surrounds equally important work, but work which gets no public acclaim.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the members of the British Parliament serve for centuries without any compensation at all. I hope the Senator from Kentucky is not going to insist that we emulate that ancient and abandoned precedent.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not prepared to go that far, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I am glad the Senator does think there is a certain limit to the compensation to be paid these Government officials.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is the Senator predicating his amendment upon the question of balancing these salaries with those of Senators and those of other Government employees, or is he basing it upon the question of the employment, and of the custom which has grown up in the various independent bureaus of giving salaries of twice the amount, in many instances, the person would receive for the same character of service if he were in private life?

Mr. GORE. I just instanced, a moment ago, that Mr. Creekmore was receiving $12,000 a year, as I understand, and then received some $75,000 in his capacity as Chief of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation. I do not think he earned the money. I do not think that many of these employees are entitled to greater pay than that enjoyed by Members of the Senate. I confess I have some point of pride in making the admission, at least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offered an amendment a few days ago, and I desire to call it up now, if it is in order, and have it disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes the following amendment: At the proper place in the bill insert the following:

SECTION 1. (a) The President is authorized to establish a National Board of Conciliation with respect to farm-mortgage indebtedness, which Board shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, a member of the Federal Reserve Board to be designated by the President for that purpose, and such other officer or agent of the Government as may be especially charged with the administration of any law or laws relating to rural credit or farm-mortgage indebtedness.

(b) The President is authorized to appoint in each State a board of State conciliation consisting of not more than five members, who shall serve without pay.

(c) It shall be the duty of said State board of conciliation to appoint or designate a suitable number of local boards of conciliation in their respective States.

(d) It shall be the duty of such State and local boards of conciliation to bring about between farm mortgagors and mortgagees an adjustment of farm-mortgage indebtedness wherever it may be found practical to do so either by a reduction in the principal of such mortgage indebtedness or in the rate of interest thereon and/or by the conversion of short-time loans into long-time loans with a provision of amortization payments and/or through an agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee under which payments could be made in staple farm products or the proceeds thereof at an agreed price or value more nearly related to the price or proceeds of a like quantity of such farm products at the date of the execution of such mortgage.

(e) The National Board of Conciliation, with the approval of the President, is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations to effectuate the purposes and objects of this section.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is a provision in the bill, which has not yet been reached, which has relation to the subject of farm mortgages.

Mr. GORE. We have not reached that yet?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That provision is under another title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to withhold his amendment until that part of the bill is reached?

Mr. GORE. I withhold the amendment temporarily.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes the following amendment:

On page 7, line 2, after the period, to insert the following: " Under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture requiring adequate facilities for the storage of grain on the farm, inspection and measurement of grain so stored, and the locking and sealing thereof, and such other regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the protection of such grain and for the marketing thereof, a reasonable percentage of any benefit payment may be advanced on any grain so stored. In any such case a deduction of not more than one half cent per bushel for inspection and sealing may be made from the amount of the benefit payment, but no deduction may be made for interest."

On page 8, after line 17, insert the following new section:

" SEC. —. It shall be unlawful for any person to move out of any warehouse any basic agricultural commodity upon which a storage certificate issued by such person is outstanding, unless such commodity is moved for continued storage, and a warehouse certificate is issued for such commodity by a public warehouseman, guaranteeing redelivery of like grade, dockage, quantity, and quality. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both. The Secretary of Agriculture may revoke any license issued under section 8 (3), if he finds, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, that the licensee has violated the provisions of this section."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I should like very much to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, for I understand that it is barely possible that the bill in its present form already covers the very kind of cases I am trying to cover by my amendment.

Practically in all the grain-growing territory we find warehouses receiving the products of the farmer which are owned or operated or in some wise controlled by commission firms. The farmer, not at all according to the story that many would have us believe, is anxious at all times, so far as he can, to help himself in emergencies such as that existing today, and because that is true annually he responds to the appeal to hold his grain. He has been educated to believe that he can hold his grain off the market and refrain from glutting the market by merely storing it with one of the public warehouses. He hauls his grain to the warehouse and the warehouseman gives him a storage certificate. Instead, however, of accomplishing what the farmer wants to accomplish, he finds his own purposes defeated by reason of the warehouseman shipping his grain, upon which he has issued a storage certificate, to the market and selling it, of course, buying futures and options as a guaranty of opportunity for him to make delivery when delivery is demanded. The whole purpose of the farmer is thus frustrated because of the ability of the warehouseman, who gives his storage certificate to the producer, to dump that grain on the market.

Under this amendment, Mr. President, if adopted, there would be a restriction which would prevent the warehouseman, the elevatorman, from disposing of that grain or from moving it from the warehouse, unless for the purpose of moving it to another place of storage. The farmer takes the storage certificate. Perhaps he wants an advance, it may be that he wants to borrow some money against the grain he has stored, and in that process he is called upon to pay 5-, 6-, 7-, or 8-percent interest to the commission man for any advance that is given him. So his entire purpose, as I have stated, is frustrated by those who have the handling of the grain which the farmer is striving to keep out of the market.

Does the Senator from South Carolina feel that the bill without this amendment would enable the administrative authorities to regulate the warehouse man as the amendment would provide?

Mr. SMITH. I will state to the Senator that we have had almost identically parallel cases occur in connection with commission merchants handling cotton. A farmer ships his cotton to a commission merchant, receives certain advances on it, has the cotton graded and stapled, and his mark placed on it. Several lawsuits have arisen by reason of the failure of the farmer on demand getting his identical cotton. Of course, it could be identified, as against the impossibility of identifying grain. The man handling the cotton would ship it, sell it, utilize the money, and buy futures against it, or, if he disposed of the cotton otherwise, he might sell futures against it. When the owner demanded the cotton, settlement would be made as of weights and grades and prices on the day settlement was demanded; but some of the farmers having their warehouse receipts with the weights and grades of their cotton specified, and the marks of identification as well, on failure to receive the identical cotton sued and recovered damages.

I realize that in the case of grain it is not possible to identify it. As I understand the process, a shipment of grain is put in with other grain; but it seems to me that if those owning the elevators grade the wheat, the owner of that wheat would have the right at any time to demand the exact amount of physical wheat that he stored and of the grade that he stored.

Mr. NYE. That is his privilege now without any additional legislation.

Mr. SMITH. Very good. Then, it is just simply a question as to whether he is going to demand it or whether he is going to settle as of the price and for the grade that he stored.

I can see that the Senator's object is to forbid the elevators disposing of the grain without the consent of the owner of the wheat. It seems to me the law now would not allow him to do so without making him subject to damages. I do not think the amendment would do any harm; I think it might be very good.

I once introduced a resolution requiring the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the alleged practice of certain cotton commission merchants in connection with shipping cotton when cotton was short at the delivery points.

Mr. NYE. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the wheat farmer, when he delivers his load of grain, not for sale but for storage, pays at the rate of at least 1 cent a month for the storage space that is to be occupied by his grain, and yet the warehouseman who issues a certificate as a receipt for that grain to be held in storage does not use the storage space at all but sends the grain on to the marketing places and sells it, and yet he gathers from the farmer as much as a cent a bushel per month for carrying that grain for the farmer. Does not the Senator feel, inasmuch as we are undertaking to do something worth while for the farmer, that we might well afford to adopt such an amendment in the bill as would enable the President or those who are to administer this new farm measure to prevent manipulation of that kind?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator read his proposed amendment?

Mr. NYE. The part which specifically relates to the point in controversy is as follows:

On page 8, after line 17, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. It shall be unlawful for any person to move out of any warehouse any basic agricultural commodity upon which a storage certificate issued by such person is outstanding, unless such commodity is moved for continued storage, and a warehouse certificate is issued for such commodity by a public warehouseman, guaranteeing redelivery of like grade, dockage, quantity, and quality. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both. The Secretary of Agriculture may revoke any license issued under section 8 (3), if he finds, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, that the licensee has violated the provisions of this section."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think that it is a very good amendment, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 11, line 12, after the word "Agriculture", it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That upon any article upon which a manufacturers' sales tax is levied under the authority of Public Act No. 154, Seventy-second Congress, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1932, and which tax is computed on the basis of weight, the manufacturer of said article shall be entitled to a credit on the manufacturers' sales tax of an amount equal to the processing tax paid on the cotton used therein as provided by this act to be offset against the manufacturers' sales tax levied against such finished article.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to avoid an unduly burdensome tax on automobile tires. The revenue act approved last June placed a tax of 2¼ cents a pound on automobile tires which in itself is an exceptionally heavy tax, running up as high as 14 percent of the value of a tire. If, in addition to that 2¼ cents a pound, the tire manufacturers are going to have passed along to them an additional charge which will result from the processing tax on cotton provided by this bill, their burden will be made still more oppressive.

Taking as an example a 20-pound tire, there is contained in it about 4 pounds of cotton. It takes about 5 pounds of cotton to process the 4 pounds included in the tire. So if, as has been computed here, a processing tax of 6 cents should be imposed upon cotton, it would result in an additional tax of about 30 cents on each tire. Each tire is already standing a tax of 2¼ cents a pound, or a total in the case of the tire used in the illustration of 45 cents. To that tax the bill, as it now stands, would add 30 cents. I submit that would be an unfair burden on an article of general use, and would unfairly burden the manufacturer who is already carrying a very heavy load. The provisions of my amendment would simply deduct from the tax payable under the Revenue Act of June 6, 1932, the amount of the tax on the weight of the cotton included in the tire.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The amendment, if adopted, would not in any way affect the cotton producer at all, would it?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; it would not affect the cotton producer, and it would not affect the revenue derived under the pending measure, though it would affect slightly the revenue derived under the act of last June.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator has the figures, may I ask him what is the average price of a 20-pound tire such as he referred to as an example? Is that the smaller-size tire?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; that is the Ford tire.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I understand, such tires are selling now at a very low price.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; unless the amendment were adopted, the total tax would run to a very high percentage, I think about 15 percent of the entire price.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the language which he is seeking to amend has already been agreed to. Does the Senator from Ohio ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action in agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered for the purpose of considering the amendment offered by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, this question was brought up before the committee, and, after consideration, as I recall, the committee felt that the processing tax on the cotton fiber used in tire casings would be paid by the mill or the manufacturing plant that processed the cotton. It is true that there is a tax on tires under another statute and the tax in this bill will inevitably add to that a certain amount. The weight of the tire, I believe, is the basis of the tax.

Mr. BULKLEY. Under the act of June 1932 the tires are taxed by weight.

Mr. SMITH. Therefore whatever weight the cotton adds to the tire will be that much additional cost if the webbing or the fiber used has been previously taxed by the processing tax. Therefore it would raise the tax on the tire. The committee did not see fit to adopt the amendment, but the facts are as stated by the Senator from Ohio. I do not believe the amount would be very great. I do not know just what percentage of the weight of the casing is included in the fiber that is in the tire.

Mr. BULKLEY. In the example I have used of a 20-pound tire, which is a small Ford tire, there are about 4 pounds of cotton fabric. But it requires about 5 pounds of cotton to be processed to make that 4 pounds of fabric, so that if the 5 pounds of cotton paid the processing tax it would be taxed 30 cents approximately. The relief which would be given under my amendment would only be 2¼ cents a pound on the 4 pounds, or 9 cents, so it would not relieve the manufacturer even of as much as the processing tax here proposed.

Mr. SMITH. This is one of the peculiar instances occurring under the probable administration of the bill. It really does amount to double taxation, because the processing of cotton necessary to go into the tire pays a tax. If that tax is added by the processor then the manufacturer of the tire necessarily would have to pay in any event a higher price for the cotton, but he also has to pay now under the law a weighted percentage of his tire. Therefore, if we increase the weight of his tire and increase the tax, as a matter of course we increase the price of the tire.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to urge upon the Senator from South Carolina that he at least be willing to accept the amendment and give it further consideration in conference. I believe that the manufacturers of rubber tires are entitled to some consideration in this situation.

If the Senator will bear with me I want to recall somewhat briefly the history of the manner in which the tax on rubber tires got into the revenue act. It got in there under a misapprehension, in the first place, as to the amount of tax which could be collected upon the rubber industry on the theory that we could impose an import tax. It was then found that there were some companies that had large stocks of crude rubber on hand in America and others which had not, and that the imposition of an import tax would work a great injustice as between those manufacturers who had large stocks in America and those who would have to import. Therefore the committee was forced, in order to raise the necessary revenue which the Treasury Department at that time estimated would balance the Budget, to go to the poundage tax. It worked out as rather a heavy tax upon the industry.

Therefore it seems to me that some consideration should be given to the industry in view of the fact that it is already carrying such a heavy tax under the revenue act. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will accept the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the memory of the Senator from Wisconsin is very accurate. The reason given for imposing such an unduly heavy tax on tires was that the revenue would be so large that we could not afford to give it up. It was estimated that $52,000,000 would be the revenue derived from that source. As a matter of fact it proved to be less than one fourth of that amount.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is true, as stated by the chairman of the committee, that this matter was brought to the attention of the committee. At the time I thought we ought to give it more careful consideration. I was impressed by the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. I think it is double taxation in view of the Revenue Act of 1932. I should be very happy if the Senator from South Carolina would permit it to go to conference.

Mr. SMITH. I am entirely willing. I was impressed the first time the Senator from Ohio made the statement that this peculiar product came under the tax in the revenue bill. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment and let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, on motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, a part of line 8 and all of lines 9, 10, and 11, on page 6, in what is known as the Smith cotton-option provision, were stricken. The Senator, however, failed to ask for an agreement on a substitute. With his permission I send forward a substitute and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the proposed amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 8, after the numerals "1935", insert the following:

The Secretary shall have authority to enter into additional option contracts for so much of such cotton as is not necessary to comply with the provisions of section 6 in combination with benefit payments as provided for in part 2 of this act.

Mr. SMITH. It is true, Mr. President, that I overlooked offering that amendment myself.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire where the language is to be inserted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On page 6, line 8, after the numerals "1935".

Mr. SMITH. The proviso at that point was stricken out, and no language was offered instead.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, what is the language offered by the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will again read the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I submit the following amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what disposition was made of the proposal of the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. I did not know that was the fact. I did not understand the nature of the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which it was amended may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Now, I should like to have a statement from the Senator from Georgia in explanation of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Oregon that I was in the chair at the time lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 were stricken, upon motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I subsequently discovered that there was nothing offered in lieu thereof and that the amendment submitted by the Department of Agriculture did suggest a substitution of the language which has just been read by the clerk.

The substituted language gives to the Secretary of Agriculture authority to enter into option contracts for any part of the cotton now on hand and held by the governmental agencies in connection with any benefit that he might see fit to allow or to enter into agreements under the subsequent provision of the bill; that is, under the so-called "allotment provision." The Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it, suggested that in connection with the cotton-option contracts he might find it advisable and agreeable to enter into additional contracts for the reduction of acreage or production under the allotment provision also. It was his view, as I understand it also, that this additional language might be necessary in order to give him that privilege.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the desire of the Senator to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into optional contracts for cotton planted at the beginning of the crop year 1933?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; and as I understand it the Secretary of Agriculture is doubtful, at least, whether he had that power under the bill without this language.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think he would have the power without it. I am just curious to know if the Senator thinks, in view of the allotment basis, that he ought to have additional authority to enter into optional contracts for cotton planted at the beginning of the crop year 1933.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think the optional contract can relate to cotton produced in 1933, but in connection with cotton already on hand that might also be combined with some of the benefits which he would be allowed to grant under the allotment provision of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Could the Secretary of Agriculture enter into a contract with a grower to cover the crop of 1933, and do we give the Secretary of Agriculture the right to purchase the crop of 1933, the same as the cotton now owned by the Government?

Mr. GEORGE. No; not that at all, but in connection with the optional cotton already in existence; in other words, operating under part 1 of the bill, if the Secretary of Agriculture desired also to bring about further reduction of cotton, he might combine the benefits which he would be permitted to allow under part 2 of the so-called "allotment plan."

Mr. McNARY. But does not the language proposed affect the crop to be harvested in 1933?

Mr. GEORGE. No; it does not, as I understand.

Mr. McNARY. Then I do not understand the language. It seems to me the Secretary would have the right to enter into an option contract for cotton planted and harvested in 1933. In other words, it is proposed to extend to this year's crop the benefits it is sought to confer upon cotton now owned by the Government.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not so understand it.

Mr. SMITH. No, Mr. President; as I understand the proposition——

Mr. GEORGE. That is, the purpose of it was not as the Senator seems to understand it.

Mr. SMITH. The proposition is simply this:

In the leasing plan, where a man has already planted, if the Secretary sees fit to combine the substitution of some cotton and a rental, he may use a part of this cotton as an inducement for the abandonment of certain acreage that has already been planted. Where the others have already taken up their option, the land would be claimed to be a little more valuable after having been fertilized and planted; and the Secretary said that in that case he would like to have the opportunity of offering an inducement, together with the rental and the cotton, to make a contract for a still further reduction of acreage.

Mr. McNARY. That is the very point about which I am inquiring. I think the option contract should be limited to the cotton now owned by the Secretary of Agriculture or upon which he has liens for moneys advanced, and that it should not be applied to crops to be planted and to be harvested in 1933 or any other year.

Mr. SMITH. What we are trying to do, even in the original bill, is to substitute this cotton for the cotton that will be produced in 1933; but if we find that there is not sufficient acreage planted to take it up, the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture was that the plan I have described be authorized.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to that, if that is the correct interpretation of the language proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I have the language before me, and I think that is the correct interpretation. May I read it?—

The Secretary shall have authority to enter into additional option contracts for so much of such cotton as is not necessary to comply with the provisions of section 6—

Section 6 is the section from which the language was stricken—in combination with benefit payments as provided for in part 2 of this act.

In other words, he might combine the two provisions if he saw fit to do so.

Mr. McNARY. In other words, the language that is proposed limits the crop to the cotton now owned by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE. To the cotton now owned by the Secretary of Agriculture. I think there is no question about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, Mr. President, I offer the second amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 2, after the word "title" appearing in the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert:

expansion of markets and removal of surplus basic agricultural commodities and their products.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me say in explanation of this amendment that from the funds raised under the bill the Secretary of Agriculture, under section 12, is authorized to expend the money for rental and benefit payments and administrative expenses, including refunds under parts 1 and 2 of the title. The language which I am now offering simply adds "expansion of markets"; and the purpose of it is to give to the Secretary of Agriculture an additional option which he may exercise under the bill from the funds raised out of the processing tax.

That is the whole purpose of the amendment. Of course, it would be entirely optional with the Secretary whether or not he employed this particular provision if it should be agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] proposed a similar amendment several days ago——

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator did.

Mr. McNARY. At which time I entered some objection, for this reason:

The processing tax is supposed to be used exclusively to pay the benefits, if any, accruing from the operation of this bill. The money is first advanced, after an estimate, by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of Agriculture. The money so advanced is to be covered into the Treasury of the United States from the collection of the processing tax. That tax should be used exclusively for the purpose of paying these benefits to producers of the commodities mentioned in the bill.

If a portion of that fund is going to be dissipated by using money to expand markets throughout the country, there will not be on hand a sufficient sum of money to meet the demands of the farmers who may derive benefits hereunder. I think the amendment runs counter to the policy enunciated in the bill. If it is availed of, it certainly would cause a large deficit, the money to replace which would have to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States, and which, I am afraid, would operate very much against the popularity of the bill. If it did not come out of the Treasury of the United States, it would have to come from a diminution of the benefits to be received by the farmers.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is quite right on that point, but I am sure the Senator will be one of the conferees on the bill; and when this bill finally passes, if this is not a reasonable provision it can be corrected.

Let me make a further statement to the Senator.

The Senator is entirely right in saying that from the money raised by the processing tax the Secretary of Agriculture may grant certain benefits. He may lease acreage, or he may pay back to the producer of the taxed commodity his pro rata part of the tax. If he should use a portion of the funds raised by the tax for the purpose of expanding markets, he would, of course, thereby diminish the amount that would be returned to the producer in the form of one benefit or another. That is true; but in the one case of cotton—and I am thinking of it entirely—in the one case of cotton the Secretary of Agriculture might find it more advantageous to the cotton producer if he utilized a part of the processing tax levied on cotton for the purpose of expanding the market for cotton products than if he utilized it all for the rental of acreage or for the return to the farmer of the fee levied in the form of a direct benefit.

I desire to say to the Senator that as a matter of fact there is an enormous market for coarse cotton goods in South America, in China, and in Russia; but those markets cannot be utilized to the advantage of the cotton-producer in the United States or to the advantage of the manufacturer of cotton textiles in the United States, because we have not any means of financing or assisting in financing credit in those particular markets.

For instance, it is easy enough to finance 80 percent or perhaps 85 percent of the entire cost of the cotton, but nearly every other country exporting cotton textiles is able to finance for a longer period 15 to 20 percent of the value of the product. So this amendment simply gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the power, if he sees fit, to say, "We will take 1 cent of the processing tax levied on cotton and create a fund of $25,000,000," which would give a credit basis for the expansion of the markets of at least $150,000,000; and that, in the opinion of both the producers and the Secretary, might be far more advantageous than undertaking to pass back to the producers of cotton in the form of direct benefits, either under the acreage leasing provision or under the so-called "allotment provision" itself, the entire processing tax. It would be optional with the Secretary of Agriculture, of course.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I am interested in the thought he is expressing.

Is it not true that the markets of the Orient and the markets of South America, to which the Senator has just referred, are closed to our products because of the fact that we do not recognize their medium of exchange, because when they present their medium of exchange they present it on the basis of the market value of today rather than on a stabilized basis?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator, of course, is quite right in that observation; but it is also true that we have not developed credit facilities for carrying our products into these markets as other countries have developed their credit facilities, and until we do it we shall find ourselves excluded from many of the profitable markets.

This provision is constructive. This provision will do good to cotton. This provision can be successfully applied; but the Secretary of Agriculture, of course, might not apply it. It simply gives him the option. Instead of using an all-acreage-licensing proposal or an all-allotment proposal, it simply gives him the additional option of using a part of the processing tax levied on the particular commodity to carry that commodity or its products into markets from which it is now excluded.

If the Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill, will consent, I very much hope that the Senator from Oregon will accept the amendment and let it go to conference, anyway.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the amendment is adopted I desire to state that I had overlooked the fact that the Department had sent down a proposed amendment which covers the very point that the Senator from Georgia has in view. It proposes, on page 16, to strike out line 22 and all down through page 17, line 19, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 12. (a) There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000 to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for administrative expenses under this title and for rental and benefit payments made with respect to reduction in acreage or reduction in production for market under part 2 of this title. Such sums shall remain available until expended.

(b) In addition to the foregoing the proceeds derived from all taxes imposed under this title are hereby appropriated to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for expansion of markets and removal of surplus agricultural products and the following purposes under part 2 of this title: Administrative expenses, rental and benefit payments, and refunds on taxes. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury shall jointly estimate from time to time the amounts, in addition to any moneys available under subsection (a), currently required for such purposes; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, out of any moneys from the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, advance to the Secretary of Agriculture the amounts so estimated. The amount of any such advance shall be deducted from such tax proceeds as shall subsequently become available under this subsection.

(d) The administrative expenses provided for under this section shall include, among others, expenditures for personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, for law books and books of reference, for contract stenographic reporting services, and for printing and paper in addition to allotments under the existing law. The Secretary of Agriculture shall transfer to the Treasury Department, and is authorized to transfer to other agencies, out of funds available for administrative expenses under this title, such sums as are required to pay administrative expenses incurred and refunds made by such department or agencies in the administration of this title.

This amendment was prepared by the Department; and, if the Senator will allow me, I will offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as I find that it covers the identical point that was made by him.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in view of the importance of the matter presented by both the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let us finish this amendment before the absence of a quorum is suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the Senator from Nevada to withdraw that suggestion until we can discuss this amendment and dispose of it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from South Carolina informed me that he would hold this body in session until 10 o'clock——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator, if he will allow me, that after conversation and consultation with the leader, I find that so many Senators have engagements, not knowing beforehand that we were going to run on tonight, that it has been agreed that as soon as we can get through with this amendment, and possibly not later than 7 o'clock, we will take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, what is keeping us from recessing now?

Mr. SMITH. We want to get through with this amendment and get that much farther on the road toward passing the bill.

Mr. LONG. Let us get through with it. What is the amendment?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. LONG. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McCARRAN. There is one question I want to ask, and that is, Is there anything more important in this bill than the presentation that was made by the Senator from Georgia just a few moments ago or than the amendment which the Senator now offers? It seems to me highly important——

Mr. SMITH. That is true.

Mr. McCARRAN. It seems to me highly important that the Senate should be here; and I therefore will insist on my suggestion of the absence of a quorum—that is, if the Senator insists on putting this amendment to a vote tonight.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think perhaps all who are here are heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, because the department has sent to us an amendment incorporating the same idea for the expansion of the markets for American products insofar as we are able to accomplish that. If the Senator will withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum, I think perhaps nothing can be gained by delaying the reading of the amendment and having it agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. McCARRAN. As a matter of courtesy to the Senator from South Carolina, of course; but I do suggest that I have not heard anything more important or more profound than that which came from the lips of the Senator from Georgia just a few moments ago. It seemed to me that it was important to the whole life of the bill. It also seems to me that perchance the substitute offered by the Senator from South Carolina may be very important to the bill. I wonder why, with so many Senators absent, we should proceed now. What is the haste and hurry, when Senators are called away? In the next 15 or 20 minutes we might put something into the bill, and other Senators would wonder why it was in. I do not want to be discourteous, and I do not propose to be.

Mr. GEORGE. May I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that, since the Senator from Nevada has expressed himself as being desirous of having a full Senate here to consider the amendment, perhaps it would be wise not to insist upon action on the amendment tonight and not to have a quorum called but let the matter go over until tomorrow morning, and let the amendment be pending.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I am jealous of every minute that is lost. It seems to me this bill should be passed, and I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that we vote on this amendment before we conclude our business, and then I will ask for a recess.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in view of the expressions I have heard, which I believe are worthy of being considered in connection with this all-important bill, I cannot withhold my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will allow me, there is a quorum present, and we will be wasting time if one is called. I make this suggestion to the Senator, that if he thinks the amendment is a good one as far as he sees it, let us go ahead and vote on the amendment and accord the Senator from South Carolina that much courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Nevada whether he insists on his suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, my object is not to defeat the substitute offered or to defeat the amendment of the Senator from Georgia but to understand what is going into the bill. I am sincere in the matter, and I want to be understood as being sincere in the matter. If there is something offered that we do not understand, which is not in print, which is not on the desks of Senators, I respectfully suggest that it should not be put forward at this hour of the day.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina probably realizes on reflection that he will not gain any time if there is going to be a fight on the amendment. Why not take a recess now and let it be pending in the morning, and have a full attendance and fight it out?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, that would be perfectly agreeable to me, but I just want to state that there is nothing in the amendment but what is contained in the provisions of the bill, because it proposes an appropriation, which shall be returned when the taxes are collected, in order to put the measure into immediate effect, coupled with the identical amendment which the Senator from Georgia has offered, and that is all.

Of course, as the Senator from Nevada insists that all the Senators shall be present, or as nearly as may be, I am going to suggest that we take a recess.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk and ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

RECESS

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.) took a recess until tomorrow, April 20, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

SENATE

THURSDAY, APRIL 20, 1933

(Legislative day of Monday, Apr. 17, 1933)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. REED. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is detained from the Senate by reason of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

FUNCTIONS OF THE INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION (S.DOC. NO. 39)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a report showing the functions and activities conducted under the jurisdiction of the Inland Waterways Corporation, the statutory authority therefor, and the total expenditures thereon for the year ended June 30, 1932, and also a list of employees receiving compensation of $5,000 or more per annum, which, with the accompanying statements, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FUNCTIONS OF SHIPPING BOARD MERCHANT FLEET CORPORATION (S.DOC. NO. 37)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 351, Seventy-second Congress, a report showing the organization and functions, including accounting, disbursing, collecting, purchasing, etc., together with the authority therefor, and the annual cost thereof, also a list of officers and employees receiving salaries of $5,000 or more per annum, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, favoring the passage of legislation looking to determination by a judicial tribunal of the rights of owners of property bordering on the shores of the Lake of the Woods, and also the granting of authority to the Attorney General to compromise and adjust all valid claims arising out of the fluctuation of the level of said lake, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. SHIPSTEAD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota favoring the prompt passage of legislation providing relief to counties and drainage districts on account of drainage bond indebtedness, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. SHIPSTEAD on the 19th instant, p. 1908, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, favoring the lowering of the interest rate pertaining to the refinancing of farm mortgages provided in the pending farm relief bill to 3 percent per annum, which was ordered to lie on the table.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. SHIPSTEAD on the 19th instant, p. 1951, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate 2 petitions and 7 letters in the nature of petitions from 92 citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for a senatorial investigation of alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate 9 letters and 23 telegrams in the nature of memorials from 140 citizens and organizations in the State of Louisiana and 1 in the State of New York, endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, condemning attacks made upon him, and remonstrating against a senatorial investigation of his alleged acts and conduct, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Mid-Continent Oil & Gas Association, Tulsa, Okla., favoring the passage of legislation to exclude from interstate and foreign commerce the products of crude petroleum produced in violation of State conservation laws, and also the products of such illegally produced crude oil, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the advisory board of the American Coalition of Patriotic, Civic, and Fraternal Societies, opposing any reduction in the present strength or personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, or any diminution or elimination of military training of the civilian components, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALSH presented a petition of sundry citizens of Weston, Dorchester, Newton, Quincy, Brookline, Lynn, Jamaica Plain, and Watertown, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the proposed low limit in pending legislation providing mortgage relief to home owners, and praying for the raising of such limit to $20,000, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens, being postal employees of Oklahoma City, Okla., praying for the passage of legislation similar to the so-called "Black bill", to limit the hours of labor in the Postal Service to 6 hours per day and 30 hours per week, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Revere, Milton, Dorchester, Brookville, Boston, Melrose, and Malden, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Black-Connery 30-hour-week work bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a petition of teachers in the public schools of Chicago, Ill., praying for an investigation of the so-called "citizens' committee" on public expenditures functioning in Chicago and the abnormal decline in prices of educational tax anticipation warrants, and directing attention to the plight of the school teachers of Chicago in connection with nonpayment of salaries, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Catskill Post 110, and the Greene County committee, American Legion, of the State of New York, pledging support to the President of the United States, especially in reference to veterans' affairs, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Mike Holm, secretary of state of the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy with record of the original instrument in my office of house file no. 1922, being Resolution No. 20, Laws of Minnesota, 1933, filed in this office on the 17th day of April 1933, and that said copy is a true and correct transcript of said instrument and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State at the capitol in St. Paul this 18th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL]

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Joint resolution memorializing the President of the United States and Congress that appropriate action be taken to place in the hands of a judicial tribunal the determination of damages suffered by owners of property bordering the Lake of the Woods and to authorize the Department of Justice to compromise and adjust the valid claims arising out of the fluctuation of the level of said lake

Whereas by reason of fluctuation of the level of the Lake of the Woods caused by artificial obstruction at the outlets of said lake in the Dominion of Canada substantial damage has been done to real estate and personal property situated in the State of Minnesota, giving rise to just claims on account of such damage to residents of the State of Minnesota and others; and

Whereas an investigation and report covering the cause and consequences of such fluctuation of the level of said lake has been made by the International Joint Commission under a reference from the Governments of the United States and Canada dated June 23, 1913, which terminated in a treaty between the United States and Great Britain in respect of Canada, proclaimed July 17, 1925, in which the two Governments undertook certain obligations, among which were: First, that the Government of the United States would acquire and permit a perpetual flowage easement on lands bordering the Lake of the Woods in Minnesota up to elevation 1064, sea-level datum; secondly, that the Dominion of Canada would pay to the United States $375,000 to apply on the cost of acquiring such flowage easement, and that any additional cost above said sum be borne and shared equally between the two said Governments; thirdly, that each Government shall assume responsibility for damage or injury on its own side of the boundary that may have resulted to it or to its inhabitants from said fluctuation of the level of said lake; and

Whereas the Secretary of War by act of Congress was authorized and directed to acquire said flowage easement by purchase or condemnation, and to investigate and determine the character and amount of damage caused to property in the State of Minnesota prior to the acquisition of said flowage easement; and

Whereas the Secretary of War has been unable to acquire said flowage easement by purchase, and has instituted condemnation proceedings to acquire the same, the said condemnation proceedings now being in the process of adjudication in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota; and

Whereas the Secretary of War has investigated the said past damage claims and has submitted his report to Congress with reference to the character and extent of said past damages; and

Whereas it is the claim and firm belief of a large number of the owners of property bordering the shores of the Lake of the Woods damaged by the fluctuation of the level of said lake that the findings and report of the Secretary of War with reference to said damages is unfair to the property owners, and is grossly unjust in the character and amount of damages awarded, and that they are entitled, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, to have their legal rights and the amount of damage which they have suffered adjudicated and determined by a judicial tribunal; and

Whereas it is the firm belief of many of said property owners that a just and expeditious adjustment and settlement of said damage claims, as well as said condemnation proceedings, would be greatly facilitated by the vesting of authority in the Attorney General to conduct and complete all litigation, negotiation, and settlement of all claims arising out of the fluctuation of the level of said lake, and by relieving the Secretary of War of further responsibility in connection therewith: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense and opinion of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, regularly assembled, representing the people of the State of Minnesota, that the owners of property bordering the shores of the Lake of the Woods are rightfully entitled to have the character and extent of the damages which they have suffered determined by a judicial tribunal rather than that their said rights be arbitrarily fixed by the War Department; also that a grant of authority to the Attorney General of the United States to compromise and adjust all valid claims arising out of the fluctuation of the level of said lake would promote the ends of justice, eliminate delay and needless expense, and relieve dissatisfaction and great suffering among large numbers of the residents of the State of Minnesota; and be it further

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Minnesota respectfully petitions the honorable the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States that appropriate action be taken to permit claimants their day in court, that their grievances may be adjudged by a judicial tribunal, and that the Department of Justice be authorized to substitute and promote an equitable adjustment of claims for the grievous delay and needless expense which thus far has characterized the Lake of the Woods proceedings; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this joint resolution be forwarded to Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; to Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President of the United States; to Hon. Henry T. Rainey, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
K. K. SOLBERG,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house of representatives the 30th day of March 1933.
FRANK T. STARKEY,
Chief Clerk, House of Representatives.

Passed the senate the 12th day of April 1933.
G. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved April 17, 1933.
FLOYD B. OLSON,
Governor of the State of Minnesota.

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the following house concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

House Concurrent Resolution 4 (session of 1929)

A concurrent resolution requesting that State road no. 26–A, from Venus, in Highlands County, Fla., to Everglade, in Collier County, Fla., be included in the State of Florida's allotment of roads entitled to Federal aid as a military road or otherwise

Whereas State road no. 26–A (now designated as State road no. 164), running from Venus, in Highlands County, Fla., to Everglade, in Collier County, Fla., is an existing highway which has been substantially graded and improved as included in the designation of State highways in the State of Florida in its State highway system; and

Whereas the location and route of said road is such as to make the same extremely valuable for the use of a military road in time of war and for use as a commercial highway at other times: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Florida respectfully call the attention of the Senators of the State of Florida and their Representatives in the Congress of the United States to said State road no. 26–A, running from Venus, in Highlands County, Fla., to Everglade, in Collier County, Fla., and request the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from Florida to present to the proper Federal bureau or department and to the Congress of the United States the advisability of having said road included in the system of roads in the State of Florida entitled to Federal aid as a military road or otherwise; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution under the great seal of the State of Florida be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives of Florida in the Congress of the United States to be filed with said Congress of the United States and with the proper Federal bureau or department having jurisdiction of matters hereinbefore referred to.

Approved June 20, A.D. 1929.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Postmaster General to issue a series of special stamps in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the white man's discovery of Wisconsin

Whereas 1934 marks the three hundredth anniversary of the white man's discovery of Wisconsin; and

Whereas the people of the State of Wisconsin are already concerning themselves in making suitable arrangements for the holding of appropriate exercises in connection with this tercentenary celebration; and

Whereas there is a long-established custom in this country to fittingly observe historical occasions of this kind; and

Whereas for the purpose of giving a Nation-wide prominence to this historical event, it would be but proper that the Postal Department issue a special stamp commemorating the tercentenary celebration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin does hereby urge and request the Postmaster General to issue a series of special stamps which will stress the historical significance of the three hundredth anniversary of the white man's discovery of Wisconsin; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, properly attested, be sent to the Postmaster General of the United States and to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

KOSCIUSKO COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask that a letter addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and that it may lie on the table.

It refers to Senate Joint Resolutions Nos. 19 and 20, introduced by Senator WALCOTT and myself, respectively, authorizing the issuance of a special postage stamp in honor of Brig. Gen. Thaddeus Kosciusko.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 25, 1933.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: The Postmaster General has asked me to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of March 17 submitting copies of Senate Joint Resolutions Nos. 19 and 20, introduced by Senator WALCOTT and Senator WALSH, respectively, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which authorize the issuance of a special series of stamps to commemorate the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the naturalization as an American citizen of Brig. Gen. Thaddeus Kosciusko.

The Department has been receiving many applications for a Kosciusko commemorative stamp, and careful consideration has been given the matter. However, it is found that our postage-stamp program for the present year will not permit the issuance of a special stamp for this event.

Very truly yours,

HARLLEE BRANCH,
Executive Assistant to the Postmaster General.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 135) to amend section 2 of the act approved February 4, 1933, to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF THE INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of John Collier, of California, to be Commissioner of Indian Affairs, vice Charles J. Rhoads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McADOO:

A bill (S. 1466) to provide for regulated expansion of currency and credit, to reduce the national debt, to raise the price level of commodities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. POPE:

A bill (S. 1467) to add certain lands to the Challis National Forest; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. LONERGAN:

A bill (S. 1468) to reduce the rate of certain interest payable to the United States to the rate of 4 percent per annum; and

A bill (S. 1469) to permit the importation of goods made by indentured labor only to the extent necessary to supply American demands which cannot be met by American production, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BONE:

A bill (S. 1470) for the relief of volunteer officers and soldiers who served in the Philippine Islands beyond the period of their enlistment; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 1471) for the relief of Russell C. Cross; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 1472) granting a pension to John E. Cutlip;

A bill (S. 1473) granting a pension to Rose Kennedy;

A bill (S. 1474) granting a pension to Wilbur J. Patterson;

A bill (S. 1475) granting a pension to Allie Selick;

A bill (S. 1476) granting a pension to William J. Smith;

A bill (S. 1477) granting a pension to Richard H. Wraase;

A bill (S. 1478) granting an increase of pension to Frank Deloe;

A bill (S. 1479) granting an increase of pension to John H. Jackson; and

A bill (S. 1480) granting an increase of pension to Jess Musgrave; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 1481) for the relief of John E. Meehan; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. TYDINGS (by request):

A bill (S. 1482) for the relief of the Western Electric Co., Inc.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 1483) granting certain public lands to the State of Montana for the use and benefit of the Northern Montana College; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 1484) for the relief of Miles Thomas Barrett; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 1485) for the relief of Harriet DeLarm; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1486) granting a pension to Jessica G. Roome; to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. COPELAND, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1382) for the relief of Uldric Thompson, Jr., and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENT

Mr. COSTIGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Mr. WAGNER's amendment in the nature of a substitute to title II to House bill 3835, the farm relief bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting several nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

FEDERAL GOLD POLICIES

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Herald of April 19, 1933, apropos the gold policy of our Government. President Roosevelt is to be commended for placing the embargo on our gold, keeping it at home instead of sending it abroad to help Europe further to deflate our price level. Since the bank holiday went into effect, the Secretary of Labor informs us that unemployment has increased by 4.2 percent and pay rolls have decreased 8.2 percent. Meanwhile Europe manipulates her currency, making it more possible for her to send more goods to us over our tariff walls, even now threatened with reduction.

The next step the President must take to protect our country, unless our European competitors cease pegging our dollar and forcing down our prices, is to increase the tariff walls to keep their goods out. It is ridiculous for this country to buy goods from Europe and pay them gold but to throw our own citizens in jail for demanding the same privileges—payment in gold for their labor and goods.

It is more than probable that our European debtors are trying to force us to revaluate our gold dollar, making it applicable to their debts to us, thereby canceling them to the extent of another 40 percent. They have hoped that by manipulating their currencies, forcing down our commodity levels, they could put us into such an embarrassing financial situation as to compel us to revaluate our gold to their distinct advantage. Any such benefits for our debtor class they would insist be made applicable to their debts.

It behooves America to be careful in her dealings with our European debtors, lest they again come out of the conference, as usual, the gainers at our expense. A tiger may change his stripes, but he is still a tiger.

FEDERAL GOLD POLICIES

By Julius G. Berens, financial editor New York American

Two serious tactical blunders have been committed by the financial experts of the Government.

They are contained in the latest drastic order which forbids American citizens from holding more than $100 in gold, while foreigners holding gold in this country under "earmark" are permitted to withdraw this gold under specific privilege granted by the President's order.

President Roosevelt should be fully acquainted with the repercussions of his order.

The American public expects no more than a square deal under the "new deal" administration or any other.

They are patriotic to the extent of sacrificing themselves to the commonweal.

But they are rightfully hesitant to yield their rights and lawful privileges for the benefit of foreigners.

The spectacle of an American citizen being brought before an American court, charged with an act which is a crime to him but a special privilege for foreigners, is one which may well redound to the injury of the Government in its confidence-inspiring program.

Furthermore, it is to be noted that gold held outside the United States by Americans is not included in the return order.

Are the real hoarders, probably the greatest hoarders, who shipped their gold out of the country, to escape?

More than that, the American citizen undoubtedly is willing to sacrifice his financial prerogative if such action promised relief from the depression.

But does release of gold for foreigners hold out this prospect?

An embargo on gold exports from the United States would give the United States Government an all-powerful whip over the leading capitalistic nations of Europe.

With it the United States would dominate the world economic conference.

A gold embargo would freeze in this country the several hundreds of millions of gold which foreign interests have "earmarked" to their account here.

The President must not be blind to facts.

He must know that during the short period of the gold-export embargo since his emergency proclamation was issued a great change of heart had swept through the capitals of Europe.

Let the President recall recent events.

Suddenly the French exhibited great haste in revising their previous stand against payment of their debt to us.

France has a big stake in "earmarked" gold here.

England, which had refused absolutely to consider stabilization of the pound, equally suddenly shows great interest in discussing the question.

England has an enormous stake in "earmarked" gold here.

In fact, it was withdrawals from the American gold stock which has built up the Bank of England's gold supply to the greatest total in British history.

The "peak for all time" in the British gold supply was reached the day before the latest presidential gold order.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in the nature of a substitute for section 12 of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator state what the amendment is?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the amendment is to make an appropriation to carry on the work provided for in the bill until such time as the tax can be collected and the Treasury reimbursed.

Mr. BORAH. How much is the appropriation?

Mr. SMITH. I think it is $100,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he anticipates $100,000,000 will be required in payment of the expenses of administration of the measure over a period of a few months?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no. This is to pay the processing tax as the commodities are sold, so that when the goods are sold the processor then may get his tax. That is all it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to have the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] just a moment. Several days ago, as the Senator from Oregon will recall, I offered an amendment, on page 12, line 22, after the word "drying", to insert the words "or converting into insecticides and fertilizer." At that time the Senator from Oregon wanted to know whether the amendment met the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. I have ascertained that it does meet his approval. I have further ascertained, may I say to the Senator, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue also states that there is no tax on this refuse, or that whatever tax it is has been collected on the principal tobacco. Therefore I offer the amendment again and ask that it may be adopted. First I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 12 was agreed to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will report the amendment now offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, line 23, after the word "drying", in parentheses, insert the words "or converting into insecticides and fertilizer."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Title 1 is open to further amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, on page 13, line 18, I move to strike out the word "emergency", so that it will read:

Provided, That no salary in excess of $10,000 per annum shall be paid to any officer, employee, or expert of the agricultural adjustment administration—

And so forth.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not get the reference. Where is the amendment to be inserted?

Mr. SMITH. Page 13, line 18. The administration desires the word taken out for reasons which will be obvious to anyone reading the language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, line 8, after the word "parties", it is proposed to insert the following: "Such agreements and any act or acts done in pursuance thereof shall be presumed to be legal in any public or private proceeding."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when this matter came before the committee, I was told that it was opposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], because it involves, in their opinion, a waiving of the so-called "consent decree" affecting the packers. In their absence I must object to the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have just had a quorum call.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to the amendment itself, but I do not want consideration of it to take place in the absence of those Senators.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of the amendment. The Senator from Oregon can send for the absent Senators; and while they are coming, we may have the explanation from the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps I am anticipating the Senator from Alabama, but, as I understand the amendment which was offered to this provision of the bill, it is to remove those who may violate the antitrust law from its provisions and give them absolute immunity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no such purpose.

Mr. KING. I hope the implications arising from the proposed amendment will be in harmony with the statement just made by the able Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The matter came before the committee, as stated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and was discussed there. It will be noticed that subsection (2) on page 7 authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture—

To enter into marketing agreements with processors, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling in the current of interstate or foreign commerce of any agricultural commodity or product thereof after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties.

It is, of course, contemplated by that provision that marketing agreements may be entered into with the Government for the purpose of increasing the price of certain processed commodities as contemplated by the bill. The question arose as to whether or not agreements entered into with the Government under this authorization would afford protection, to millers and processors who made the agreements, from prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law. It was the position of the attorney for the Department that they were fully and amply protected under the terms of the bill, on the theory that if the agreements were authorized, then when entered into they became legal agreements. Since that time it has developed that some of the attorneys——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is there anyone opposing the Senator's amendment? I cannot see that there would be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No one that I know of. I know there was opposition in the committee. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] opposed it there.

Mr. LONG. I do not see why there should be any opposition. I assume that it is the law anyway.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That has been my view of it; but, as I said, in the preliminary discussion between the representatives of the department and of the processors it developed that while they are willing to enter into these agreements, which are, of course, for the advantage of the producer, at least one or more of them stated that they believed such agreements would not be lawfully permitted. I take it that it would be a most unusual situation to authorize agreements with the Government itself, invite processors to enter into those agreements in order to carry out the provisions of the bill, without even allowing an excise tax, without giving those who enter into the agreements unquestioned and undoubted immunity from prosecution in carrying out the agreements made with the agents of the Government itself.

If it is necessary to make the point absolutely clear, so as to remove objections made by attorneys who have given contrary advice, it seems to me we might as well either repeal the provision or make it perfectly clear that those who enter into these agreements at the solicitation of the Government will have perfect and absolute immunity, in carrying out their agreements with the Government, both from prosecution and from individual suits for violating the Sherman antitrust law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will refrain from pressing his amendment until the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] can reach the Chamber.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be temporarily laid aside. Are there any further amendments to title I? If not, amendments to title II are in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I offer now an amendment which I submitted several days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following new subsection:

(f) (1) If the Secretary of Agriculture finds, upon investigation at any time and after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, that any basic agricultural commodity or any product thereof is suffering disadvantages in competition with imports of jute or other vegetable fibers, or the products thereof, he shall proclaim such finding, and shall specify in his proclamation the rate of duty necessary to prevent such disadvantages in competition. Thereafter there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the importation, from any foreign country into the United States, of jute and other vegetable fibers and goods processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from jute or other vegetable fibers a duty at the rate specified in such proclamation. Such duty shall be in addition to any other duty imposed by law.

(2) The duties imposed by this subsection shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as duties imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930, and shall be treated, for the purposes of all provisions of the law relating to the customs revenue, as duties imposed by such act.

(3) As used in this subsection the term "United States" means the United States and its possessions, except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as I understand the bill, one of its prime purposes is to increase the price of farm commodities by reducing the production of such commodities. It is self-evident if, in reducing the production of farm commodities the legislation tends to increase the use of substitutes that cannot be grown and produced by the farmers of the United States, that while we may temporarily slightly elevate the price of farm commodities, eventually it will tend to destroy the very industry that we seek to save.

The two greatest competing vegetable fibers in this country are cotton and jute. Jute is only grown in a relatively small section of India. Less than 2 percent of the cultivable land of India is devoted to its production. There is imported into this country each year from 700,000,000 to 900,000,000 pounds of jute. This vegetable fiber is produced by pauper labor that receives from 8 to 10 cents a day. It comes into this country in its raw state duty-free. The finished product has only a very small, almost a nominal duty imposed upon it by the existing tariff law. I realize the difficulties brought upon us by the existing tariff laws, but as long as they are in effect it is my opinion the American farmer is entitled to equal protection with other industries.

Mr. President, the home consumption of cotton is an average of 5,000,000 bales per year. If a duty were imposed upon jute sufficient to discourage its importation into this country, it would provide a local market for from one million and a quarter to one million and a half additional bales of cotton each year. As the uses of this product of slave or pauper labor increase, the standards of living of the cotton farmers are gradually being forced down; and if the use of jute continues to increase, the domestic market of the American farmer will be destroyed and his standard of living reduced almost to a parity with that of those in India who produce jute, and who, at times, receive as their only compensation the stalks from the jute which are used as fuel.

This is a matter affecting not only the farmers but the industrial worker. American capital has gone to India and has established there huge mills for processing jute. Two mills in this country were dismantled and the machinery moved bodily to India. In those mills, while American workmen were left unemployed at home as a result of the removal of this machinery, we see the spinners and those who labor in the mills being paid only 20 to 35 cents a day and the product of their work brought into this country practically duty-free, coming in competition with the product of all the labor of all the textile workers of these United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

Mr. LONG. Is not raising the price of our cotton through this processing tax going to put us at a great deal more disadvantage?

Mr. RUSSELL. It will increase the disadvantage, because as the price of cotton products is increased, naturally greater efforts will be made to substitute this more cheaply produced commodity from abroad.

This country uses 61 percent of the total processed jute produced in India. As I have said, it is imported in its raw state duty-free, with only a very low and nominal duty levied upon the finished product.

Mr. President, the unemployment condition in this country has been a subject of much discussion on this floor, as well as the plight of our farmers. I recognize that the pending international tariff conferences perhaps make it wise not to fix any definite and specific duty on this commodity at this time in this bill. This amendment, therefore, merely gives the Secretary of Agriculture the right, after investigation, to assess a duty on jute that will make more equitable the competition between the jute producers of India and the cotton farmers of the United States.

This action will not only redound to the benefit of the cotton farmer, but if we enable him to control his domestic market in the consumption of cotton and vegetable fibers and thereby increase the price of cotton, he will then be able to buy finished products from all over the United States.

Cotton is our greatest export. Since 1865 it has brought into this Nation from abroad the staggering sum of $25,700,000,000 in new wealth, all dug out of the ground by the American farmer and sent abroad in the form of raw cotton. I feel that the very least we can do for him is to afford him some protection in his domestic market.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the subject matter of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is already covered in the bill on page 20, where provision is made for the imposition of a tax upon any article, either imported or domestically produced, competing with any article of domestic production.

Mr. RUSSELL and Mr. LONG addresed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I desire to point out to the Senator from South Carolina that while it is true that under the bill a compensating tax may be assessed that is equal to the tax levied upon the competing commodity produced within the United States, this amendment proposes to give to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to levy additional duties upon vegetable fibers that come in competition with cotton or any of the basic commodities enumerated in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment would add anything to the terms of the bill, and it really injects into the bill the question of a tariff, which I do not think would be germane.

I dislike to resist an amendment of the Senator from Georgia; but I hope this amendment will not be adopted, because it injects the tariff question into this bill, and, in my opinion, the matter is amply provided for already.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we have been breaking precedents pretty rapidly in recent weeks; but this is the most astounding proposal that I have yet heard.

If there is one policy that the Congress has adhered to in dealing with the tariff, it is not by tariff duties to compel the use by the American people of substitutes. This proposal seeks to compel the American people to use some fabric or commodity other than that which they may choose to use for their own purposes. It proposes a policy that we have repudiated again and again. Congress has repeatedly decided that tariffs shall not be levied upon the principle that the American people must not use a certain commodity or product but must use some other product, and duties shall be levied with that purpose in mind.

We had this principle or policy brought home to us very dramatically and graphically when it was suggested that we put a duty upon bananas so as to compel the American people to buy apples. It is unsound. Not only is it unsound because of its attempt to compel Americans to use substitutes, but it is unsound because it gives the Secretary of Agriculture the power to levy tariff duties, to tax the American people. It removes from the Tariff Commission and from the President and repudiates the flexible provisions of the tariff by entrusting to the Secretary of Agriculture the determination of what tariff shall be levied upon jute; and he is to be governed in levying that tariff by the principle that some other commodity, some other raw material, ought to be used instead of jute.

The amendment is most unsound and should be defeated.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Massachusetts certainly would not oppose this amendment merely because of the power delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture, would he, in view of the very broad powers that are already delegated by the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly would. The broad powers delegated by the bill, as I understand them, are due to the fact that in our efforts to increase the price of basic farm commodities we propose to tax the imports from foreign countries that are made from these basic farm products to the same extent that the manufactured or finished or processed material that comes from these basic farm products are taxed. I think that is consistent with the underlying principle of the bill; but the Senator's proposal is that we go beyond that and give the Secretary of Agriculture power to levy a tariff duty on one commodity, jute, and commodities similar to jute, and base his power to levy a tariff duty on the fact that that particular commodity or those commodities are in competition with cotton, in the expectation that the American people will abandon any uses of jute because of the prohibitive tariff duty levied, and will use cotton and its by-products.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. LONG. I am afraid the Senator from Massachusetts has not fully understood what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] said. The use of jute has already reached the point where our American cotton mills have been practically moved to India to manufacture, with their American machinery, jute to send back into this country that we no longer make here. If we go ahead with this price raising of cotton, it is going to mean that that disadvantage will be probably doubled or trebled, and we are going to compel our American manufacturers to go into the jute business to supply the American market. If we are going to empower the Secretary of Agriculture, as we have done in this instance, to regulate the price of cotton, then it is an absolute necessity that he be allowed to protect our manufacturers from having to go into the jute business. Otherwise it will be valueless to empower him to help us raise the domestic price of cotton.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, the Senator says that the processing tax is not sufficient to protect the cotton producer.

Mr. LONG. Yes. Not only that, but I have grave doubts whether the tariff provisions that are written in this bill will be of any value to us in meeting the jute competition. We are going to raise the price of cotton domestically; and when we have raised the price of cotton domestically, if the cotton mills already are having to move to India—as two of them have done, as the Senator from Georgia points out—it is going to mean that the remainder of them will have to move to India in order to compete in our own American market.

We cannot sell cotton here in competition with jute. We are not able to do it now; and if the condition is further aggravated, and we do not allow the Secretary of Agriculture to neutralize it, then we are going to be worse off than if we were not included at all.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me the question proposed in this amendment is a tariff question, pure and simple; and it is entering into the domain that I have referred to, namely, of attempting to make the American people use substitutes for some particular commodity which they desire to use. Why stop at jute and other vegetable fibers? Why not give the Secretary of Agriculture power to revise all the tariff schedules?

Mr. LONG. No; I wish to say to the Senator that we have gone into the tariff question in this bill already to some extent.

Mr. WALSH. Where is power to raise tariff duties conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture in this bill?

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; this is a tariff bill. This bill provides that tariffs shall be levied on the products that come from abroad to make up the difference of the process tax on some of these articles. It is a tariff bill.

Mr. WALSH. The same tax that is levied upon domestic articles is to be levied on comparable imports.

Mr. LONG. We are right in line with the thought of the bill in trying to put a tariff on jute. No one can tell just what that tariff will have to be. It is not exactly the same product—it is a competing product—and we are right in line with the bill in proposing it, because the bill itself recognizes the necessity for tariffs, and actually levies tariffs.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator calls them tariffs. I suppose technically they are tariffs, but they are a tax levied upon imports similar to the tax that is collected from domestic producers who have processed cotton and wheat and the other agricultural products referred to in the bill.

It seems to me that that is an entirely different question from the question of giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority and power to levy a tariff tax of undetermined amount, whatever rate he determines upon, so as to prevent importations into this country of jute and the other products referred to. If that is done, I do not see why we should stop with these particular products. I do not see why we should not give the Secretary authority to readjust the whole tariff schedule, in view of the attempt made here to protect one commodity by levying a tariff tax upon another commodity of a different character which happens to be in competition with cotton.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a report from the Department of Commerce of the United States. In referring to the jute manufacturing industry in India, it says:

> The jute manufacturing industry, centered around Calcutta, has enjoyed uninterrupted progress since the first mill was established in the middle of the last century. Proximity to the raw material first attracted manufacturers—

Listen to this—> but of more importance to the local industry has been the almost unlimited supply of cheap labor, a weaver in a Calcutta mill earning at present (December 1931) around the equivalent of 35 cents a day. Other workers are paid less.

Mr. President, if I mistake not, two great manufacturing plants were moved from the State so ably represented by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. Their machinery was dismantled and the plant was moved to Calcutta in order to enjoy the benefits of the cheap labor there, leaving many unemployed in the State which the distinguished Senator so ably represents. I am sure that fact was not known to the Senator from Massachusetts or he would have sought to afford to the textile workers of his State some protection against the importation of this slave-made product.

I have here a scale showing that the average wages of the workers in the jute mills of India is $1.89 a week, as compared with an average of $18 a week in the eastern mills. Not only to protect the American farmer in his domestic market, giving him some small measure of the protection that has been enjoyed by the industries from which he has been compelled to buy all the necessities of life for so many years, but to protect the unemployed workmen of America, this amendment should promptly be inserted in this bill.

The amendment is not mandatory; it would not compel the Secretary of Agriculture to levy any tariff or duty whatever on jute. It would only permit him, in the event the bill so operated that it proved to be a permanent detriment to the cotton farmer by encouraging the further use of these other vegetable fibers, in his discretion and at such times as might be determined by him, to levy a tariff that would equalize competition and protect the interests of the citizens of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] was in the Chamber a moment ago, but he seems to have stepped out. If we are to have an amendment to the section now under consideration, it seems to me we ought to dispose of it at this time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have an amendment which was sent here by the Department of Agriculture. My colleague is not present at this time, however.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. SMITH. To what title is the amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. It is to the language on page 7, line 8, after the word "parties". I should like to say just a word before I offer the substitute, as to what makes it necessary to offer any amendment.

Mr. President, personally I do not believe that any amendment is necessary, but this is a provision of the bill which would give to the Secretary of Agriculture authority to make agreements, and if he succeeds in making agreements with processors of any commodity which will raise the price to the producer, it will be unnecessary, then, as to that commodity, to have any such thing as a processing tax, and it would very much simplify the operation of the bill to have such an amendment as I am about to offer.

To illustrate, suppose the Secretary of Agriculture desired to apply the terms of the bill to hogs. Suppose he could enter into an agreement with a sufficient number of the packers so that in his judgment there could be control of the market, and suppose that, according to the agreement made with the Secretary, the packers offered a certain price per pound for hogs. The bill would give him authority to make that kind of a contract. In my judgment, the authority to make the agreement would be a complete defense against any charge of violation of the antitrust laws. But the attorneys of the packers, I understand, claim that such an agreement would be in violation of the present antitrust laws, and, of course, they do not want to enter into any agreement which would make them liable for violation of those laws.

I do not agree with them; I think that if authority were given to make such a contract, that would be a complete defense. Nevertheless, we must realize that the Secretary could do nothing under the terms of the bill unless he made an agreement with the packers, so we must get their consent. I see no objection, even though I do not think it is necessary, to putting into the bill a provision that the making of any such agreement shall not be held to be a violation of the antitrust laws.

I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama might raise a presumption that immunity was to be given in the case of some other violation. Of course, we do not want to do that. I think we could meet this contention in very simple language; and I offer an amendment which, in my judgment, would meet the situation, and there would be no possibility of any construction being put on it under which any packer who made an agreement would have immunity in the case of any other violation.

In lieu of the language in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, I offer as a substitute the following, to be inserted on page 7, line 8, after the word "parties":

> The making of such agreement shall not be held to be a violation of any of the antitrust laws of the United States.

It seems to me that covers the matter, and I do not see any loophole in it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, we are driving at exactly the same object, and if the Senator thinks his amendment covers the situation, I am entirely willing to accept it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska offer this as a substitute or as supplementary?

Mr. NORRIS. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I understand the Senator is willing to accept it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; it would do the same thing exactly.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, of course the language which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska is not as objectionable as the language in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. The language used in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama would not only go to the agreements which might be made but to any act or acts done in pursuance of such an agreement, with the result that the packers, millers, and other processors could claim that almost any act which they performed was done in pursuance of the agreement which they had made with the Secretary of Agriculture. In other words, they could agree upon a price-fixing policy with reference to anything they produced, and then could and would contend that anything they did or any practice they engaged in, whether beneficial to the people or not, was necessary.

Mr. President, I think that such a provision in the proposed law would be an exceedingly dangerous one for the Congress to enact. We all know that the packers have been here year after year and year after year trying to get a modification of the consent decree entered into in the courts by the Government on the one side and the packers on the other. Ever since that decree was entered the packers have carried on a consistent campaign from one end of the country to the other to break down the consent decree they were forced to enter into during the Wilson administration.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. With reference to what the able Senator from Montana has said, is it not true that the packers consented to that decree in court?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; they consented to it, but they only consented to it for the reason that they were afraid that if they did not consent to that kind of a decree they would have a much more severe decree entered because of the acts and the deeds which they had committed in the past.

At every session of the Congress some group of individuals comes here, not only the packers but other groups of individuals, saying that the thing we have done has been to break down the Sherman antitrust law. During the last few years, particularly during the boom times of 1928 and 1929, the great financial interests of this country, of every kind and character, have been coming to the Congress of the United States and saying, "The thing you have to do in order to have business be successful is to repeal the Sherman antitrust law."

Now it is proposed that we say to the Secretary of Agriculture in this measure, "You are at perfect liberty to enter into any kind of an agreement which seems to you proper with the packers of the country, with the millers of the country, and not only with the packers and with the millers of the country but with very kind of combination in the United States to violate the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law." What becomes of the Sherman antitrust law when we pass such a measure as this, giving the Secretary of Agriculture power to do such a thing? In effect, we would completely break down the Sherman antitrust law. Does the Congress of the United States want to take that position?

The first thing that came before us in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was the proposal to add an amendment to this measure so that any agreement entered into with the Secretary of Agriculture should be conclusive evidence that it was not a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. When the committee would not stand for that, another amendment was offered, to the effect that such agreement and any act or acts done in pursuance thereof should be presumed to be legal in any public or private proceeding. It is the most outrageous thing I have heard proposed in the Congress of the United States to say that the Secretary of Agriculture can enter into an agreement with the packers of the country and that a private individual should then be deprived of his right to sue them under the Sherman antitrust law for a violation of that law.

It is proposed that we give the Secretary of Agriculture that power. I say we are simply losing all our sense of balance, and are going back on everything the Congress of the United States has stood for if we pass this kind of a measure with that sort of provision in it.

Mr. President, do we want to say to the packers of the United States, "You can enter into an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture, and any act you do will be perfectly legal"? Do we want to say to the millers of the country, "You can enter into some kind of an agreement whereby you will pay certain prices for wheat and then, by reason of that fact, any act or deed that you commit shall be legal thereafter if it is in pursuance of the effort to carry out that agreement"? Do we want to say to the textile interests of the country, "You can enter into an agreement with reference to the price you are going to pay for cotton and then, after that, any act or deed you commit in pursuance of fixing that price shall be legal both as against the private citizen and against the Government of the United States"? If so, Mr. President, I say the Congress of the United States has completely lost its sense of proportion in this era of hysteria when the idea of giving power to some of the executive departments is running riot. As a matter of fact, I think we have given the Department entirely too much power under this bill, and not only do I think we are giving it too much power but I think that it is more power than any Secretary ought to want or ought to ask for.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not a fact that the cotton-mill operators, the packers, and other processors came down to Washington when this bill was originally proposed to fight it, but withdrew their opposition and went home when it was discovered the bill was a vehicle for price fixing and the emasculation of the Antitrust Act?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the thing that softened the packers in their opposition to the bill, the thing that softened the millers in their opposition to the bill, and what softened the opposition of the processors of all kinds to this bill was the fact that they realized that under it they could get together and violate at will the Sherman antitrust law. That was the reason for it, as everybody that knows anything about the situation realizes. And now we propose not only to give them the power to enter into agreements of this kind, but to say that any agreements they may enter into will be legal. I am not willing to do that. I say it is wrong in principle; I say we have no right to say, and we should not say, to any organization or any group of individuals in the United States, "You can enter into an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture and that agreement will carry with it anything, even that which is outside what other the law provides; and if the Secretary enters into such agreements, anything he may do is presumed to be legal." Why give him any more power? Why should he have any more power? Why should the packers and others be clothed with any more authority than is given to any other individual in the United States of America? When the clerk of a court or the recorder of a court or the sheriff performs some act or some deed or enters into some kind of an agreement, that act or deed or that contract is presumed to be legal under the law. Why should we clothe the Secretary of Agriculture, why should we clothe the packers with any more authority than that with which we clothe any other officer of the United States? I, for one, Mr. President, will not vote for it; and I want to say, if this provision giving the packers that kind of authority shall go in the bill, I will be very much inclined to vote against it, because I am convinced that it is fundamentally unsound, fundamentally un-American, and fundamentally opposed to every principle upon which our Government is founded, as well as being fundamentally opposed to every law which the Congress of the United States has enacted and placed upon the statute books.

Now, Mr. President, let me say further——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator agree with me in the statement that this amendment as a matter of law does not add anything to the bill?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not at all sure about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator agree with me in the statement that the contracts provided for in the bill, even without the adoption of the pending amendment, would be held to be not in violation of the law?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not so sure about that at all. Let me say to the Senator the presumption would be that they would be legal.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, then, at least the Senator will absolve me in offering this amendment from any attempt to give the packers or other processors any immunity from the antitrust laws?

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no; I think the Senator's amendment would give them immunity.

Mr. NORRIS. Do they not have immunity now?

Mr. WHEELER. No; I do not think they do.

Mr. NORRIS. I cannot myself understand that position. When we pass a law giving, as this bill does, the Secretary of Agriculture express authority to make the agreement provided for, does the Senator think if such agreements should be entered into in pursuance of the act of Congress the parties would still be liable under the antitrust law?

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that there is a presumption that the contract entered into would be legal, but in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court and in view of the law, in my judgment, there would be a question as to how far the Secretary could go in carrying out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment would not extend that authority.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senate should adopt an amendment providing in effect or in so many words that anything done by any of the parties to the agreements shall not be held to be a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, I think that would be broadening the bill tremendously; and, so far as I am concerned, I am opposed to that kind of an amendment going into the bill. I think that it is not half so bad as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], because, under his amendment, not only would the agreement itself be held not to be a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, but if the parties to the agreement committed any act or any deed outside of the agreement which they might contend was in pursuance of carrying out the agreement, then it would be absolutely legal against private individuals or against the Government of the United States.

We all know, Mr. President, what the people of this country have suffered at the hands of the packers; we all know what the cattlemen—how they were robbed at the hands of the packers, until finally public opinion became so aroused that the Congress of the United States carried on an investigation, as investigations were likewise carried on by various States in various sections of the country, as a result of which laws were enacted on the subject and prosecutions were instituted by the Attorney General of the United States. It was Francis J. Heney, as I recall, who made a great reputation by uncovering the crookedness and rottenness of the packers in their dealings with individuals. Now they come in and say, "We not only want to be able to make these agreements, but we want you to make legal any act we do in pursuance of the agreements."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether, possibly, there is not a confusion as to legal terms? A contract ordinarily is presumed to be legal, just as all our acts are presumed to be legal, but that is a rebuttable presumption. Do we not, if we put in the act a presumption, make it what is known as a "legal or conclusive presumption", which is irrebuttable?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course that is exactly what the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would do, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I intended to do.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to enable the Government of the United States, under the authority of law, to make a contract, and then have the same Government back up and punish the man—I do not care whether he be a criminal or a preacher—who enters into that contract with the Government. That is not honorable; it is not a square thing for the Government to do to enter into a contract and say, "You may agree to do this in order to raise the price of some commodity for the farmer, but after you have entered into the agreement, after we get the benefit of it, we will turn around and prosecute you for entering into that very contract."

Mr. WHEELER. Who is the Government of the United States? Is it the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. NORRIS. In this instance the Secretary of Agriculture represents the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. In my judgment, the Secretary of Agriculture is not the Government of the United States, nor is any other member of the President's Cabinet the Government of the United States; and I propose not to give him the right to enter into a contract and to say it shall be legal whether or not the Congress of the United States intended that kind of an agreement should be entered into. We do not know, under the terms of this bill, what kind of an agreement may be entered into.

I have great faith in the present Secretary of Agriculture, but we may not always have him as Secretary of Agriculture. Supposing there should be a Secretary of Agriculture who is not as faithful and honest as is the present Secretary of Agriculture, then in what kind of a position would the Congress of the United States be placed? We know that we have had Secretaries in the Cabinets of Presidents of the United States who have not, to say the least, measured up to the responsibilities of the office. We have had our Daughertys; we have had our Falls. Would the Senator from Nebraska want to turn this power over to a Fall or a Daugherty and then say to him, "You may make any contract you desire and commit any act you may think necessary in pursuance thereof"?

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator asking the question for the purpose of eliciting an answer?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I can answer in one word, no; and there is not anything I have done or proposed to do from which the Senator has any right to draw the conclusion that I want any head of a department to do such a thing.

Mr. WHEELER. I am simply saying to the Senator that perhaps his amendment would do exactly that thing.

Mr. NORRIS. It would not do anything of the kind. There is not any Fall as Secretary of Agriculture; there is not a Doheny as Secretary of Agriculture; there is not any Sinclair as Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WHEELER. It is true that there is not at the present time, but we do not know when one of their kind may get into the Cabinet.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly yield to a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think we all wish to give the Secretary of Agriculture the opportunity of making fair processing agreements. It is thought by many that if that is done it may not be necessary to levy the processing tax; and if that can be avoided it is certainly a desirable end. If the representatives of the packers say they will not enter into such agreements unless they are given immunity from prosecution before entering into them, how can the Government insist upon the right to make processing agreements with them and at the same time prosecute them for violating another statute?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, we cannot force them to enter into any agreement under any circumstances or conditions either under this bill or any other. Even if we adopt this amendment we cannot force them to enter into agreements.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no.

Mr. WHEELER. What protection are the people of the United States going to have if we simply give this unlimited authority to the Secretary of Agriculture? I have the highest regard for Mr. Wallace, the present Secretary of Agriculture; I think he is an honest, honorable man; but he is not infallible, and no other Secretary we will ever have will be infallible, though when we give him this power we are going on the assumption that we have a man there who is infallible and that "the king can do no wrong."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. In view of the fact that among my constituency are a large number of packers, so described, may I ask the able Senator from Montana what has arisen to make on this occasion the packers his thought under this bill? What is it that they are asking to do? What is it that the Government is asking or forbidding them to do? What law is being violated? I should like the able Senator from Montana to let me know, if he can, what is the occasion or justification for this present assault. If it is justified I can join in it if it is in behalf of the American Republic, and, if it is not, it ought not to be indulged.

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad to answer the Senator. I said that what will happen is that, under this bill as it is written at the present time, the Secretary of Agriculture will be given the right to enter into agreements with the packers for the purpose of fixing prices. The packers are not satisfied with that. They came down here and asked, first, that we write into the bill a provision that any agreement they may enter into shall be conclusively presumed to be legal and not in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. That was turned down by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Then they come in with this amendment reading:

> Such agreements and any act or acts done in pursuance thereof shall be presumed to be legal in any public or private proceeding.

In other words, the Congress of the United States is giving the Secretary of Agriculture the right to enter into agreements with the packers, and then the packers want to have it understood that any act they may commit shall be considered legal. I am not referring to the packers alone, because it applies to all processors, including millers. We had an investigation with reference to the millers, and we all know what until recently the conduct of the millers of the Northwest has been with reference to the farmers of that region. We know that during the Wilson administration an investigation was conducted which showed the practices they had carried on and how they treated the farmers of the Northwest. We placed upon the statute books of the United States the Sherman antitrust law for the purpose of protecting the people of the United States against great combinations because we said that they were violating the fundamental laws of the land, they were crushing the people, they were robbing them and stealing from them, and we wanted those laws put upon the statute books.

Now it is proposed by one stroke of the pen that Congress shall delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to violate those laws, and that when he enters into any agreement that violates such a law, then it shall be conclusively held that the agreement which he enters into, regardless of what it may be or how broad it may be, shall be legal and not held in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. They want us to go farther and say that not only shall it be presumed to be legal, but that it shall be conclusively held to be legal, and I say that is not right.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Conceding the issue raised by him and the objection urged by him as to some provision of the bill in the manner of its operation as he may anticipate it, I ask the able Senator upon what basis does he make the accusation that the packers have come here and that it is they who have asked for the provision?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not think there was any secret about it.

Mr. LEWIS. If there is any application to the millers and others, why should the packers be held responsible for all that applies to all the others?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not think there was any secret about it, because it was told to us in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that it was the packers who wanted the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator who told him?

Mr. WHEELER. Who told me? There were two other Senators who made the statement in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LEWIS. I will not ask the names of the Senators, but I want the able Senator's attention that if his accusation, delivered with a ferment of forcefulness, is based upon something that was told to somebody by somebody who heard it from somebody else who heard it from someone else who in turn was told by somebody else, I would not lay it as a basis of the sort of accusation that has been laid by my eminent friend the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. There is nothing to that. The packers came here and asked for the amendment. I make that charge and I make that statement without fear of contradiction on the part of the packers themselves. If the Senator thinks there is any question about it and that I am stating something that is hearsay evidence, if he will consult the representatives of the packers themselves, they will tell him they wanted this amendment and that they sought out Senators and asked that it be placed in the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Assuming that his confidence is not being at all misplaced and that he is correct in his deduction, may I ask the Senator if there is anything in the bill or the provision to which he addresses himself that gives to the packers any advantages in their operations over any other set of business men or associates who may have the processing privilege under the measure?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course not. Not only do the packers want it, as a matter of fact, but, as I said on the floor of the Senate just a little while ago, the millers themselves, I understand, would like to have it, although I do not know of any miller or miller's representative that came here and asked for the amendment. It would apply not only to the packers but it would apply to the millers and probably to the manufacturers of cotton goods. It would apply to the processors of any commodity that is processed under the terms of the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Then what the Senator is objecting to is the power that seems to be vested in an official applicable to whoever may obtain benefits under it?

Mr. WHEELER. I have been trying to explain that for the last half hour, but it is quite apparent that I have not made myself understood.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure the Senator has, but it has been my regret that, being occupied outside of the Chamber on committee matters, I was denied hearing the able arguments of the Senator from Montana, always a loss to any and all Senators.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate the sarcasm of the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, no, Mr. President. I protest. I insist that every speech of the Senator is a contribution to the Senate of admitted worth and influence.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to impress upon the Senator exactly what this means. I appreciate that these people want the amendment, but, as I said a moment ago, I submit that it is fundamentally unsound. We do not give it to any other class of citizens in the United States. If we are going to give it to the packers and the millers, if we are going to give them absolution from violation of the Sherman antitrust law, then we ought to give the same privilege to every other class of citizens in the United States alike. The packers are going to have absolution from any violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and the millers and the cotton manufacturers will have it, too. If we are going to give it to them under the terms of the bill, let us just abolish the Sherman antitrust law entirely.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, most of the argument of the Senator from Montana is against the text of the bill. I thought when he began his argument that he was against the amendment. Assuming that the text of the bill is going to remain, I do not think his argument is any reason why we should reject the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, it is quite apparent I have not made myself clear.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator did. He made himself quite clear and I was coming to that. The Senator is anticipating me. When he started I thought he made himself quite clear that he was for the amendment. Later on in his argument he made it quite clear that he was opposed to the amendment and everything else.

Mr. WHEELER. I have perhaps a very unfortunate way of stating my views. I thought I made it clear that I was opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. I said it was much preferable to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, yet that I am likewise opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska because, instead of making prima facie valid the agreement that may be entered into with the packers, as it would be under the bill, his amendment in effect gives them absolution if they enter into agreements in violation of the antitrust law. I think it is a dangerous thing to give that power to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator now says in substance, as I gather the purport of the question which he has asked me, that the amendment gives absolution and immunity in the event of doing things which the law specifically authorizes them to do.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with that statement. No one can tell in advance what the Secretary of Agriculture will do. He may enter into agreements that will be legal or he may enter into other agreements that would be held to be illegal under the terms of the Sherman antitrust law. But the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska makes absolutely legal any kind of an agreement which they enter into, so far as violation of the Sherman antitrust law is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator object if I changed it to read that the making of any "legal" agreement provided for, and so forth? Would that make any difference?

Mr. WHEELER. I think it would make a very great deal of difference.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to inserting that language. The amendment I have offered does not add one iota to the legal aspect of the language already in the bill. I tried to explain why I thought it was necessary to offer it, and that was that the agreements, if they are made at all, must, of course, gain the consent of the persons who enter into the agreements with the Secretary. There is no compulsion. If they say, even without any foundation—and I think it is without any foundation—"We are afraid that we violate the Sherman antitrust law if we make this agreement with you", then I think in all honesty and fairness, if we are going to enter into an agreement with them, we ought to say, "Of course, we are asking you to make this agreement. We have come to you to get the agreement. We are trying to get your consent and we are not going to prosecute you if you agree to it and do what we want you to do." So the amendment does not add anything, although it may be the means of getting agreements that we otherwise could not get.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me suggest to the Senator that we have enacted an export law relating to certain commodities. The Attorney General entered into certain agreements with certain individuals with reference to that law. There is a question whether the agreement that was entered into by the Attorney General in the last administration came within the terms of that law. We had a provision in that law such as the Senator asks for here, providing that any agreement that was entered into would be legal and that there would not be any question at all about the agreement being legal.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not say "any agreement." Moreover, the agreement of the Attorney General to which the Senator refers was not made in pursuance of a law that specifically authorized him to make the agreement. There is the difference.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator is quite wrong with reference to that statement because the Attorney General himself felt that he was entering into an agreement that was in pursuance of the law. There was a disagreement as to whether the law contemplated that he should go as far as he did and whether or not he could enter into agreements of that character which would be held to be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not have a very good memory, but I was here when that agreement was made. I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when the matter was brought up there. I heard the testimony of the Attorney General who appeared before that committee. I did not agree with him. I was opposed to the proposition. The agreement was made at a time that directly affected legislation which was then pending. In my judgment, it defeated the legislation which I and, I think, a majority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry were trying to bring about at that time. Ever since that was done they have tried to have the consent decree modified in all kinds of ways. I have not been one of the supporters of that proposal. But it has not anything to do, as I look at it, with a bill similar to the one now before us.

I have no quarrel with the Senator from Montana or any other Senator who is opposed to the provisions of the bill now before us which give to the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to make this kind of agreements. I concede that power, like all the other powers in the bill, is enormous. The powers granted are startling. I admit all that. They would not be supported in the Senate for a moment, in my judgment, if we were living under normal conditions and in normal times. But we started out to try to improve the condition of the farmer. We want to raise the price of the things he has to sell. One of the powers conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture to bring this about is found on page 7, subsection (2). It is to that clause that the language is offered as an amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORRIS. Not just now. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator after a little while.

We are proposing to give to the Secretary the powers enumerated in the bill. If we do not want to give him those powers, let us strike out the provision. I concede there is good argument that can be made in favor of striking out the provision. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is evidently opposed to delegating such power to the Secretary of Agriculture. While I do not agree with him, I want to give the power to the Secretary in this instance on account of the emergency and the good that I think may possibly come from it. Nevertheless, I concede any man's right to oppose it, because it is an extraordinary power that never ought to be given to any man under ordinary circumstances and conditions.

We have proposed that, however. That is in the bill; and we get these men together in a room, these processors—perhaps packers, perhaps somebody else; we have used the packers as an illustration—and we say to them, "Will you not agree to pay the farmers of America 6 cents a pound for hogs? We want to make that agreement with you under this law." The packers say, "We will agree to do that"; and then they enter into the agreement, and they pay 6 cents a pound for hogs. The agreement is carried out. In my judgment, no court or lawyer on earth would hold that because they had carried out an agreement that they made under a law of Congress with the representative of the Government of the United States they had violated an antitrust law that was on the statute books before that time.

If you should hold that that is true, let us assume the other case, now. Take the packers' view that that would be a violation of the antitrust law. Suppose the United States Government goes to a packer of hogs, or to a processor of milk, or to a miller who manufactures wheat into flour, and says to him, "Come in here and make this agreement with us. We want to help the farmers of America. We want you to agree to pay a certain price for the farm products of America." They enter into that agreement at our request, under our law that we passed, asking that it be done; and then, after it is done and we get the benefit of it, we turn around and say to the Attorney General, "Prosecute those fellows for violating the antitrust law."

In what position would the Government be if it did a thing of that kind? No court on earth would convict them. No jury would convict them. No honest man can say that that is right.

If we ought not to enter into an agreement of that sort, then let us strike this provision out of the bill. I concede that Senators are perfectly logical if they do that; but if we leave it in the bill and invite a man under the law to make a contract and then send him to jail for doing it, we would incur the contempt of honest men everywhere, if we could do such a thing. Of course, we could not, but that is the fear here.

I think the packers' attorneys are wrong, but we must get them to consent to an agreement. We cannot force them to make an agreement; and in order to induce them to make it we ought to be willing to say, "If you make the agreement that we ask you to make, we will not prosecute you for making it."

That is all that this provision says.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I desire to direct the attention of the Senator to the text of the bill as found in paragraph (2).

There is very much potency in the argument submitted by the Senator, very much to support his position; but I ask the Senator whether he interprets the text of paragraph (2) as permitting the Secretary of Agriculture not only to enter into agreements fixing the price which shall be paid to the farmers, but also to enter into monopolistic agreements with the packers or the processors, under the terms of which they may charge just such prices as they please, which may be extortionate, and thus be protected from prosecution.

I am inclined to think the Senator is upon moral ground, if not upon legal ground, in contending that if the Secretary makes an agreement with the packers that they shall pay—using the Senator's illustration—5 or 6 or 7 cents a pound for hogs, they ought not to be prosecuted. But suppose the Secretary goes farther under the provisions of paragraph (2), as I read it, and says to them, "Now that I have made that agreement with you with respect to the price you are to pay to the farmers, you may charge whatever you please. You may combine, you may confederate together, and raise the prices as your sense of justice or your cupidity may determine, and you will be immune from prosecution", by virtue of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Nebraska. Does the Senator think that would be right?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think that would be right.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that under the provision to which I refer that could be done?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that is right, and I do not think that could be done. I would not want to do anything of that kind. The agreement that I have been speaking of—and I think probably it is the only agreement that will be made—is to pay a certain price for products. Suppose they make that agreement, and carry it out in good faith, and this provision is in the law. They have made the agreement. There is nothing in the agreement that gives permission to the packers, after they have made it, to enter into an illegal conspiracy as to what they shall sell their product for. There will be nothing in the agreement about the sale, undoubtedly. They could combine afterward, and they would be liable under the antitrust law if they did so, because they would not be protected in such a practice by any agreement that any Secretary of Agriculture with any sense would enter into with them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that the Senator is correct.

Suppose one of the conditions precedent to entering into the agreement demanded by the packers or millers or processors were the following: "You have asked us to pay this sum, which we think is too much, for the commodity which we intend to process. We therefore want authority, and want you to put that in the agreement, to sell the product at such prices as we may feel will yield us a profit, and to combine together for that purpose, so that there will be no competition."

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think the Secretary of Agriculture would enter into an agreement of that kind?

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator believe that under paragraph (2) he could do that?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think he could do it in good faith. I cannot conceive of a Secretary of Agriculture entering into an agreement that would say, if it is packers, for instance, that we are illustrating it with, "You will pay 6 cents a pound for hogs. The Secretary further agrees with the packers that after you have done that you will be at perfect liberty to enter into any kind of a combination you want to with other packers or other dealers, charge anything or do anything that you want to." I cannot conceive of the Secretary making an agreement of that kind.

Mr. WHEELER. But that is the trouble, let me say to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish with the Senator from Utah, and then I will yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, there is not a thing in this bill, not a sentence that I know of, that would prohibit the Secretary, in making any of these agreements, from making a fool of himself. He might say, "I am going to levy on every miller a processing tax of $10 a sack for every sack of flour he makes." He could do that. He might say to the packers, if he put the provision in operation as to hogs, "I am going to levy a processing tax of 25 cents a pound on every pound of meat that you process." Does anybody think he is going to do it?

Mr. President, why are we giving this power to the Secretary? Because we realize that we are in a terrible condition, that something must be done to give the farmer more money for what he produces and has to sell, and we give the power to the Secretary.

Under another provision of this bill, where the Secretary, if he puts the third title into operation, has to determine what the cost of wheat is in the United States, suppose he arbitrarily issues a proclamation and says, "I find that the cost of production of wheat is $25 a bushel": He could do that, could he not? He probably would get in the insane asylum before he got very far, of course. Nobody conceives that he is going to do that.

Senators answer me and say, "Why not make it specific, and say that he is to fix it at a certain figure?" Nobody knows what the figure should be. That depends upon the winds, and the hail, and the worms, and the bugs, and the hurricanes, and the storms. Nobody knows in advance. We must give to him some power, some discretion, to fix it; and the same condition exists here.

The Secretary could do a senseless, useless, insane thing; that is possible, and that is true of everything in this bill. That is true of all legislation that we pass where we give any discretion to any man. We could object to the confirmation of a man for judge because we might say, "He might be called upon to appraise a piece of land," let us say, "that might be under condemnation proceedings. He might instruct a jury and say, 'Gentlemen, this land is worth only 10 cents an acre'; or, on the other hand, he might say, 'It is worth $2,000,000 an acre.'" He could do that. We could object to the confirmation of nominees for the Supreme Court because we could say, "A case might come up tomorrow in which the members of the Supreme Court would go out and sell their opinions for money." They could do that; and so we might go on through every activity in human life.

Somewhere, somebody must reach a conclusion—not that it is perfect; not that it is even right, but in the judgment of the man who is making it it is right; and we must abide by it until, under proper procedure, we set it aside or overrule it. Objection can be made to putting any man in any office; and thousands of instances might be cited of things that he might do that would be perfectly foolish and silly.

In a nutshell, however, we are saying here to the Secretary of Agriculture, "Make agreements with the men who buy butterfat of the farmer and process it into butter; make agreements with the men who buy wheat and process it into flour; make agreements with the men who buy hogs and process them into the finished products ready for the consumer." We give the Secretary a right to levy a processing tax. We do not say how much that is going to be, because we do not know. The Secretary does not know now. Nobody believes that he is going to be absolutely accurate when he finds the processing tax and what it should be; but he finds something and puts it into force. If he were an insane man, we would not give him that authority. If the man in the White House—who, after all, I assume, when he wants to, will control the actions of the Secretary of Agriculture—were crazy, we would not pass this bill. If we did not have faith in his honesty, his integrity, and his honest desire to relieve the present situation of all our people, we would not pass this bill. We would not give him any authority; but we must trust somebody. The power must be lodged with someone, as my friend to my left says. If there is not anybody in whom we have faith in whom to lodge it, we should not pass the bill, because it will be a difficult measure to enforce.

The agreement provided for in the particular part of the bill which we are discussing now, in my judgment, if it can be worked, will simplify the activities under this law. Instead of putting hogs on the processing list and going through what I think would be an interminable lot of regulations, making it difficult, if not impossible, to get a fair administration of the measure, how much simpler it would be if we could call together enough representatives of packers so that by an agreement that the Government of the United States, through the Secretary of Agriculture, could enter into with them, they would all pay a certain minimum price. They could pay as much above it as they wanted to, but we would fix a minimum price. It is no objection to such an agreement to say, as the Senator from Utah pointed out in his illustration, that the Secretary might likewise, in the same agreement, say, "After you processors have paid this tax, we give you immunity to violate every law on the statute books."

I cannot conceive that he is going to make such an agreement. If I believed he would, I would not vote for this amendment. I would not be for anything that is in the bill, because all the power will be lodged with the Secretary.

I repeat, Mr. President, as a matter of common honesty, the great Government of the United States should go not to a man, whether he be a minister, a gambler, a packer, or a farmer, and say to him, "Enter into this agreement by which you agree to pay 6 cents a pound for hogs, so much for butter, if it is a butter agreement, so much for wheat, if it is a flour mill," and then afterward prosecute him for doing the very thing which, in the name of the people of the United States, he was asked to do. I cannot conceive of anything of that kind being done.

That is the reason why I think this amendment is necessary. I would not offer it if I did not think it might help the Secretary to get an agreement. When a packer or a milkman or a butterman or a flourman says to him, "I am afraid to enter into this agreement because it violates a law that is on the statute books", and the Secretary says, "Well, if you do enter into it, I am going to prosecute you when I get everything out of you this agreement calls for", he would not get the agreement, would he? As I have said so many times, there is no danger of that. We must have the consent of these men or no agreement will be made, so the Secretary can say, "I want you to make this agreement; and if you make it, you will not be prosecuted for a violation of any antitrust law."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator had perfected the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not had time to perfect it yet.

Mr. LONG. I understood the Senator had inserted the word "legal."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I see no reason why we all cannot vote for the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I will put the word "legal" into the amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator that the proposed amendment would go a long way toward effectuating the purposes of the bill; but I want to call his attention to a provision of what we know as the antitrust law.

I read a part of section 73, Public Law 227, of the Fifty-third Congress:

> That every combination, conspiracy, trust, agreement, or contract is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy, illegal, and void, when the same is made by or between two or more persons or corporations either of whom is engaged in importing any article from any foreign country into the United States, and when such combination, conspiracy, trust, agreement, or contract is intended to operate in restraint of lawful trade, or free competition in lawful trade or commerce, or to increase the market price in any part of the United States of any article or articles imported or intended to be imported into the United States, or of any manufacture into which such imported article enters, or is intended to enter—

And so forth.

As I view the Senator's proposal, he contemplates that agreements shall be entered into between the Secretary of Agriculture and these processors to fix some rate or price upon the commodity, necessarily above the market price. If such an agreement be entered into, it must of necessity be entered into with combinations of processors, for no individual processor would be willing to pay a higher price for a commodity than would be paid by his competitors. So there would be, to my mind, an agreement absolutely in violation of the provisions of this law. I cannot see it in any other way. There would be a combination, necessarily; and if those processors, in agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture, pay a higher price, they must have some assurance that they are going to require the payment of a higher price to them for their products, which in effect will be an agreement contrary to the provisions of this law.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it that the Senator is in favor of my amendment, then?

Mr. HEBERT. I am quite in favor of the amendment which the Senator has offered. It has been brought to my attention many times, and particularly during the consideration of the unemployment-insurance problems by industrialists that there ought to be some provision permitting them to agree among themselves to curtail production in some way and to fix prices to some extent. They say that that is the only way in which production can ever be curtailed. I think there is some merit in that. How far we should go in letting down the bars set up by the Sherman antitrust law is another question, but clearly under the Senator's amendment we are going to permit that which is illegal to be done by these processors.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator, in reading the law as he has, and then calling this agreement an illegal one, fails to take into consideration the fact that no agreement will be made under this proposed law unless the proposed law shall have been passed and signed by the President. Then it will have become a law. To the extent of its terms it will be a modification of the antitrust laws of the United States. I have no doubt about that. In other words, if we did not expressly state what my amendment provides, I think the effect would be the same, because the proposed law, if any such agreement is made, is going to be on the statute books when the agreement is made. The proposed law specifically authorizes the making of such an agreement which, I am frank to state, if made without this amendment would be a violation of the antitrust laws. I have no dispute with the Senator about that.

Mr. HEBERT. That was my view, and I wanted to be clear upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt about it. But there will be a new law, passed subsequent to the antitrust law, authorizing a specific agreement, and this new law would legalize it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think nearly every Senator here has received requests from industries in his State and in the country at large to permit them to combine along the same lines as those covered in the bill. Without discounting the logic of what the Senator has said or the necessity for the legislation, I am wondering whether, if we do adopt this provision, to what extent industry will then come into the picture and ask that the same rights given to agriculture be likewise given to industry. I simply make that observation, without wishing to take issue with what the Senator is saying.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that may happen. But let me say to the Senator that there is not much chance of that being done to any such extent as one would think. Before the agreement referred to could be made the Secretary must, by proclamation, provide that certain commodities named in the bill shall come under the law. In the first place, he would have no authority to apply it to any commodity not named in the bill. He would not have to apply it to any commodity named in the bill, but he could pick out 1 or 2 or 3 as he saw fit. He may not try to bring about the enforcement of this particular provision giving him authority to make agreements. He may decide to take one of the other methods provided for in the measure. So the probabilities are that there will be very little of what the Senator refers to.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think perhaps what the Senator says will prove to be the case, but I had in mind particularly a bill which I understand is now being prepared under the auspices of the Department of Labor which would mobilize industry pretty much along the same lines along which agriculture is to be mobilized. I am inclined to go farther for agriculture than I would want to go for industry in this matter, but I do not want to maneuver myself into a position, when that bill comes up, of having to adopt a policy such as that outlined for agriculture.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator that he add to the amendment this language: "Provided further, That such agreement shall terminate with the termination of this act."

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WHEELER. It seems to me that language should be in the amendment for the reason that otherwise the Secretary might enter into an agreement to extend over a period of 5 years and Congress might terminate this proposed law, and then those affected by the agreement could go ahead and carry on their acts under the so-called "marketing agreement" which they might have.

Mr. NORRIS. I should be glad to add that provision to the amendment. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. If the Senator's amendment shall be adopted, of course, it will abrogate the provisions of the antitrust law to the extent of its application to those commodities enumerated in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. No; not necessarily. I would not put it that broadly. I would say to the extent of the agreement.

Mr. HEBERT. To the extent of the agreement as it applies to the commodities covered in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. But it would not affect any agreements made in respect to any other commodities; in other words, commodities not included within the provisions of the bill would not get the benefit of immunity from the antitrust law. So would it not, in the Senator's opinion, be a decided advantage to the processors of these particular commodities over processors of commodities not included within the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. That may be. Of course, that objection, if it be a valid objection, I think applies to every provision in the bill, because all commodities are not included in the bill. We have the peculiar predicament of a great many people who are engaged in the production of a great many of these commodities which are included in the bill trying very hard to get them out, and a great many others producing other commodities trying in every way they can to get them included. I myself do not claim to be able to solve the mysteries of the subject. I do not know what actuates other people, and they may all be right. If they are, there are some commodities out which ought to be in, and there are some in which ought to be out.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understood it, the Senator wanted to perfect his amendment, and I am going to yield the floor to the Senator from Nebraska as soon as he has perfected his amendment.

I had understood that the inflation message would be here at some hour today, and, as far as I was concerned, I was marking time, waiting for the Presidential message to come and for the amendment which I had understood would be offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

This whole bill is of minor importance compared to the bill relative to currency which I understood would be introduced in the Senate. If the President's proposal is as I have been given to understand it would be, it is naturally going to mean that many of us may swallow this bill, hook, line, and sinker, in order to obtain inflation, hoping that that is going to cure all the trouble. I think that is so necessary that it would change my position to a large extent on the bill.

However, while I am speaking, Mr. President, I desire to say that I have been supplied by my friend the Senator from Washington with a copy of the American Banker of April 19, 1933. It contains an article dealing with branch banking and States:

> Branch banking may be credited with greatest failures in banking history—494 branches in unlicensed banks.

In other words, this article evidences the service that some of us undertook to render the United States here some months ago, when we then took up time, for which we were severely condemned, in our effort—and it was a successful effort—to defeat branch banking. The article in question, Mr. President, says at the request of a unit banker they are publishing a list of the branch-banking syndicates that failed and never reopened.

The First National Bank of Detroit failed with 148 branches and 9 other banks affiliated.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. That was one of the banks which we were told, when we were discussing the branch-banking proposal, was in such wonderful shape and had rendered such wonderful service to the great State of Michigan.

Mr. LONG. It was cited as a paragon of perfect banking by the proponents of branch banking; it was the white angel of banking and was cited as the reason why others should be made like unto it.

This First National Bank of Detroit, as to which the Senator from Montana interjects, failed with 148 branches and 17 operating offices and 9 affiliates.

The Union Trust Co., of Cleveland, Ohio—the example of which must have influenced the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] in the position he took, because Cleveland is the home town of my friend from Ohio—the bank failed with $194,925,000 of deposits and 22 branches. It has never since been heard from.

The Guardian National Bank of Commerce, of Detroit, another one of the angels that we were urged to follow, failed with 37 branches and 21 affiliates.

The Guardian Trust Co., of Cleveland, failed with 19 branches.

The Canal Bank & Trust Co., of New Orleans, failed with 20 branches.

The Hibernia Bank & Trust Co., of New Orleans, with 9 branches, failed.

The Baltimore Trust Co., of Baltimore, Md., failed with 19 branches.

The Union Trust Co. of Maryland, of Baltimore, Md., failed with 18 branches.

The First Central Trust Co., of Akron, Ohio, failed with 7 branches.

The Fidelity Trust Co., of Portland, Maine, failed with 11 branches.

The North Carolina Bank & Trust Co., of Greensboro, N.C., failed with 15 branches and 9 affiliates.

The American Bank & Trust Co., of Richmond, failed with nine branches.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. What was the name of the last bank which failed?

Mr. LONG. It was the American Bank & Trust Co., of Richmond, Va. I left out the name of the State. It might have been Richmond, Mont., and for that reason the Senator from Montana may have wanted the floor to say something about it. That bank failed with nine branches.

Tennessee Valley Bank, of Decatur, Ala., failed with 15 branches.

The Casco Mercantile Trust Co., of Portland, Maine, failed with nine branches.

The Page Trust Co., of Raleigh, N.C., failed with 13 branches.

The Union Trust Co., of Shelby, N.C., failed with nine branches.

The South Carolina National Bank failed with five branches.

The Central Union Bank of South Carolina, of Columbia, S.C., failed with four branches.

The East Shore Trust Co., of Cambridge, Md., failed with 20 branches.

I will send to the desk, Mr. President, and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the article relative to branch banking appearing on page 1 of this journal, and also the editorial appearing on page 4, headed:

What about 494 closed branches and the greatest failures in the history of banking?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The article and editorial appear at the conclusion of Mr. LONG'S speech, marked, respectively, "Exhibit A" and "Exhibit B.")

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, three Senators were chief among those who were condemned for having led a successful filibuster which prevented the establishment of branch banking. I have not heard anything said to their glory for the success of the efforts they made, and now I am undertaking to insert in the RECORD an article from the bankers' own journal, the American Banker, which does not mention the name of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], nor the name of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], nor that of the Senator from Louisiana. I am myself undertaking to do that, in the hope that our names may not be forgotten, by the mention now made of the great work that has been done and has been proven to have been done by the collapse of banks as a result of branch banking. [Laughter.]

EXHIBIT A

[From the American Banker, New York, Apr. 19, 1933]

BRANCH BANKING MAY BE CREDITED WITH GREATEST FAILURES IN BANKING HISTORY—494 BRANCHES IN UNLICENSED BANKS

At the request of a unit banker who has seen independent banking slandered for years by the branch-bank propagandists, we are presenting his list of branch banks which failed to receive licenses to reopen after the national banking holiday.

Among them, he points out, is the largest banking collapse in the history of the world, the First National Bank of Detroit, and together they operated a sixth of the 2,900 branch-bank offices of the country and controlled deposits of $1,300,000,000.

Some of these branch banks are being reorganized or reopened, but not all, as is the case of closed unit banks.

His list of closed branch banks and their banking offices and deposit liabilities is as follows:

First National Bank, Detroit: Deposits, $423,357,000; branches, 148; affiliated, 9 other banks; operating, 17 offices; total branches, 174; total deposits, $484,733,000. (Owned by Detroit Bankers Co.)

Union Trust Co., Cleveland: Deposits, $194,925,000; branches, 22.

Guardian National Bank of Commerce, Detroit: Deposits, $138,385,000; branches, 37; affiliated, 21 other banks; total offices, 58; total deposits, $300,000,000 (estimated). (Controlled by Guardian Detroit Union Group, Inc.)

Guardian Trust Co., Cleveland: Deposits, $109,750,000; branches, 19.

Canal Bank & Trust Co., New Orleans: Deposits, $58,243,000; branches, 20.

Hibernia Bank & Trust Co., New Orleans: Deposits, $52,863,000; branches, 9.

Baltimore Trust Co., Baltimore: Deposits, $49,000,000; branches 19.

Union Trust Co. of Maryland, Baltimore: Deposits, $45,333,000; branches, 18.

First Central Trust Co., Akron: Deposits, $41,845,000; branches, 7.

Fidelity Trust Co., Portland, Maine: Deposits, $25,604,000; branches, 11. Affiliated: Financial Institutions, Inc., group of which 4 other members also remained closed.

North Carolina Bank & Trust Co., Greensboro: Deposits, $19,337,000; branches, 15. Affiliated: Industrial Bank with 9 branches.

American Bank & Trust Co., Richmond: Deposits, $15,017,000; branches, 9.

Tennessee Valley Bank, Decatur, Ala.: Deposits, $2,988,000; branches, 15.

Casco Mercantile Trust Co., Portland, Maine: Deposits, $16,290,000; branches, 9.

Page Trust Co., Raleigh, N.C.: Deposits, $5,676,000; branches, 13.

Union Trust Co., Shelby, N.C.: Deposits, $796,000; branches, 5.

South Carolina National Bank, Charleston: Deposits, $16,814,000; branches, 5.

Central Union Bank of South Carolina, Columbia: Deposits, $7,364,000; branches, 4.

East Shore Trust Co., Cambridge, Md.: Deposits, $12,528,000; branches, 20.

EXHIBIT B

WHAT ABOUT 494 CLOSED BRANCHES AND THE GREATEST FAILURES IN THE HISTORY OF BANKING?

It has been our contention in our fight to prevent branch-bank propagandists from making unit banks the scapegoat of our troubles that branch banking might also be bad banking.

Branch banking may include some very good banks. But the sheer necessity of keeping alive is assurance most small unit banks will be managed circumspectly, while big branch banks have occasionally been rottenly managed on the assumption that other banks or the Government itself could never permit them to close.

Because big branch banks actually have received such aid very many times, the public has come to the belief that branch banking is inherently safer.

The branch-bank propagandists assiduously fostered that idea. Among them was Robert O. Lord, president of the Guardian Detroit Union Group, Inc., whose institution's final failure and insolvency contradicts much that was said officially in Washington for branch banks.

The banking holiday, moreover, brought to light conclusive evidence that Lord's branch-bank system was, to speak most charitably, far from sound. Yet he was calling for power to extend it under official Federal endorsement.

The banking holiday, moreover, brought to light the fact that there were other soft spots in the country's banking structure where branch banking had failed to produce banks sound enough to reopen without recapitalization or reorganization.

Among them are branch banks which, in their liquidation, will constitute the greatest bank failures in the history of the world.

The bitter truth revealed by a survey of these branch banks which have failed to receive licenses to reopen is that there are at least 19, controlling at least 494 branches, or 17 percent of the 2,800 branch offices in the country.

It is important to note that this is about a sixth of the total branch offices in the country, and that this figure compares closely with the fact that about a sixth of the unit banks of the country have also failed to be licensed, despite the fact that hundreds of them were tied up because their reserves were in certain of these big closed branch banks.

Not all the branch banks which have failed to get licenses were all bad. Many of them are reorganizing and will reopen, exactly as many unit banks. We wish them well. They will be sound when reopened, and worthy of confidence of their depositors.

But the record must be faced.

It should dispose forever of the propaganda that branch banks are any better under similar laws than unit banks, and, moreover, it should be clear that an ambitious, unsound branch banker can precipitate a national scandal and bank collapse, as resulted from the Michigan situation, such as not a thousand unit bank failures could cause.

And so in the interest of truth, we present the record of important branch-banking institutions which failed to receive licenses to reopen, on our first page today.

Added to the previous list of closed United States branch banks, from the $200,000,000 Bank of United States in New York, to the $26,000,000 Peoples State Bank of South Carolina with 44 branches, the record of unlicensed branch banks in the United States since the banking holiday should be an effective warning.

Further propaganda aimed at the especial advantages of branches may be a boomerang that will stir up a counter attack which will credit branch banking with not only the greatest bank failures in the history of the world, those in Detroit, but also with having been the first link that broke in a series of collapses which wrecked the banking system of an entire State, Michigan, and then pulled the whole American banking structure down with it.

MEASURES OF FINANCIAL RELIEF IN RELATION TO MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT ON REFLATION, INFLATION, AND CIRCULATION

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at a later time I propose intruding on the Senate to discuss the pending bill, but at this particular moment I wish to address to the Senate a few observations suggested by the speech just now delivered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. It is not the speech so much to which exception is taken as it is the designation and definitions adopted by the able Senator, which seem to be so general in their employment that someone should call the attention of the country to the error indulged and likewise bring to the consciousness of the legislators the injury the error may cause both to the United States and to countries abroad.

From the addresses of this morning of certain Senators it is assumed that a message will be sent to this honorable body by the President of the United States in which there will be a suggestion touching changes to be made in our present form of currency legislation. These changes have been intimated by the industrious gentlemen of the press, and have gone to a large extent to the country generally. It is here, Mr. President, where a great error with potentialities of great danger has been made. This error has been circulated through the land. It is in the main that the President's message means to demand an inflation of the currency of the United States. The word "inflation" is generally accepted as meaning a false valuation pumped into the quantity of national money in existence, and as adding a false quality to its value as it is accepted by the commercial world.

Mr. President, there is neither an effort on the part of this honorable Senate, on either side of the Chamber, nor on the part of the reflective American citizen, nor even on the part of the President of the United States, to establish an inflation of the currency of the United States in any form whatever as inflation of a nation's money is understood.

It has been demonstrated, and of later months exhibited in many different manners, that there is a lack of money sufficient in quantity to circulate among the citizens for the full uses of their business needs. It is also evident, by the history of the monetary situation of other countries of the world, that the financial system as prevailing in the United States and as limited by conditions has retarded if not obstructed the transaction of commercial business with those countries which desire to import from us commodities produced by our country because their purchasing power and standard of value are largely fixed by silver standard—part or whole—and to that extent they are at a disadvantage as compared to the United States, which is on the currency basis we designate as gold standard.

Mr. President, merely to meet the deficiency of currency necessary for the uses of the citizens of America and to aid the business of the United States to distribute its products to those countries which use silver as the basis of their coinage a change is proposed. But it is one that shall in no wise remove the gold standard from the United States or remove the United States from the gold standard. It is one which will prohibit the gold of the United States from being taken out of our country and sent to foreign lands, where it may be made the basis of speculation by those who send out the gold for the purpose of reaping interest from foreign lands, as they lose for their own country the principal. It is a measure proposed that is to prevent the gold of the United States being shipped out of our land for the purchasing of silver by distant lands to the loss of the American gold and the profit of the competing lands whose currency is based on silver.

There is one other controlling fact directing the change in finance legislation which has been constantly disguised and as to which too frequently and too long continued there has been significant silence. Mr. President, we here speak of it. There has been constantly brought to the attention of our land the efforts of the distinguished President who preceded the present occupant of the White House to avoid hoarding; that is, taking the money from the country by those who possessed or controlled it and placing it where it could be of no value to the Nation and no use to the general business world of our own Republic. The efforts made by the distinguished President preceding the present occupant were without any success either to the Nation or to the business of commerce and industry. The present President of the United States has proceeded to do what can be done to avoid the continuing of hoarding. He seeks to prevent the offense's being multiplied. He hopes to bring forth the smothered and smuggled money from its hiding places and put it at the service of the business man and commercial agencies of the United States, which need such for the awakening of our industries and reviving national prosperity. Let me therefore speak of the thing which I said was of a very serious character.

Mr. President, there has not returned to the banks nor to the United States the money which the people of the country were entitled to have circulating throughout their Nation as their per capita circulation. The reason is to be now mentioned. Many millions of gold which belong to the circulating medium of the United States were taken out of this country by those masterful manipulators of finance or those manipulators of masterful finance, and these have been hidden in different recesses of different lands other than the United States. These have neither been brought back nor is there any method that can be devised by our Government that can lay hand upon them should their exact location be determined and forcibly be brought back.

Again, sir, there is much more of millions which have been hidden and disguised in places in the United States, and that, too, by the eminent gentlemen who, calling themselves patriotic financiers, seized the unfortunate and distressful hour of our land to place themselves in the position where they could control and dominate the great amount of money they could summon. These have remained, doubtless with composure of nature and snicker of smile upon their faces, wholly quiescent and without action other than to guard the places where repose their hidden fortunes and the vast money that they were able to summon to their control and supervision. These sums also, sir, are not available to the United States, nor to any process that our constitutional Government could adopt in order to bring that money to the circulation and to the aid of business and commerce.

And now, sir, I trust our very reputable press may send out to the country the proof that it is because this gold has been sent out of the United States by those who have assumed in their unworthy object to weaken their own Nation for their own private fortunes, and this by the speculation on their own money, that they may serve the interests of foreign lands and that which has been placed in hidden spots in the United States, yet subsequently adopted for the object of those who have conspired first to weaken the credit of their own land, then afterwards to enrich themselves upon its fruits. These that are described all in all have weakened our national credit and lessened our national circulation. It is now necessary that we devise a circulation that shall be equal to that which has been taken from the circulation by the vicious hand of sinister conspiracy. Something is necessary at once to be done by the Government that we could restore to the citizen, both of commerce and private home, that which had always belonged to it on the theory of so much money per capita within the Republic.

The other was to promptly lay a basis that would stop the sending of the gold of our country out of our Nation by these same manipulators, who, having executed their design in the past with great profit, threatened by their action to continue it in the future. This much now being adopted and now suggested is merely to replace the losses put upon our Nation by those who, calling themselves financiers, were the enemies of the progress of the United States and the direct destroyers of its prospects of prosperity.

The system now suggested, I beg to say, has no suggestion whatever of either inflating the currency to a degree that gives it a false value by literally inflating it with a quantity or quality of artificial value merely because of the stamp of the Government, nor has it for its purpose the surrendering of that basic credit of the United States which we speak of as the gold standard. It is but a movement on the part of our Government, aided by those of whom we speak as Republicans and Democrats jointly where they can cooperate, to the object of restoring to the United States its ancient position where its credit can be maintained to benefit commerce, aid industry, and establish the independence of the citizen, such as it was before these ruthless hands laid the weight of their crushing power upon the credit of the land as they dishonored the Republic and disgraced themselves—all changes of method or quality of circulation to ever have our gold security as basis and as support.

Mr. President, I am therefore anxious for the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and those of whom he speaks as the "faithful three" to wholly express the design as intended—when they speak of inflation. I greatly express the desire that the three indomitable immortals, Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, Senator WHEELER, of Montana, and the gilded captain of the noble Janizaries, Senator LONG, of Louisiana, shall receive the reward such as they deserve for their prolonged and progressive fight, in view of what the eminent Senator from Louisiana feels they have earned, and which now from the White House seems approved. From my voice this trio of battling bulwark—they shall be known, as they ought to be, as the "three guardsmen", and as such to be saluted by those to whom they have conferred benefits. Yet I beseech them and their attachés in the speech that may be made by any of those eminent compatriots there shall be a correct line kept by them in their mind and description and designations that they may not do an injustice to their country or frighten the citizens of their own land or create a libel and slander against their country in other lands by charging that the President of the United States or his Congress of either party domination has any purpose to inflate the currency, to give it a false value, and then glide off what is called the standard of our security, the gold in our vaults. For such course would be to surrender the Nation to where it would be the object of an accusation of weakness of credit at home and the accusation of a national bankruptcy by our rival nations abroad.

It is for this reason that I trust that in the designation of terms these three eminent musketeers will take their place and as many with them, and as they do so in just designation receive our praise as well as our wishes for their future conduct, as noble as their past performances, I beseech that all for the present be on guard that they preserve and not destroy the reputation of their firmly established and now renowned country.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I ask unanimous consent to let the amendment be temporarily passed over and in the meantime to take up the next amendment and dispose of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that is done I desire to say a few words relating to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the colloquy a few moments ago, with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] I expressed some apprehension as to the interpretation which might be placed upon subsection 2, page 7, of the bill under consideration. As I understand the discussion upon the question before us it has been conceded that the purpose of the subdivision was to permit contracts to be entered into which might be in contravention of the terms of the antitrust laws; it is insisted, however, that the Secretary of Agriculture would act with prudence and certainly would not be disposed to enter into contractual relations which would tend to monopoly or which would violate the Federal antitrust laws.

The bill before us confers upon the Secretary of Agriculture very great authority, authority which perhaps was never before granted to any official of the Government in peace times, and in relation to what might be denominated important parts of the industrial and economic life of the people. I concede that the situation calls for measures which perhaps have never before received legislative approval. There are provisions in this bill which excite the opposition of some who ardently desire to support the administration, and who, because of the extraordinary situation in which we find ourselves, are willing to subordinate their views in the hope that the bill under consideration will avert serious consequences and lead our country out of the depression in which it finds itself.

Monopoly has always been hateful to the English-speaking people. It was condemned by the common law of Great Britain, and it has been denounced by statutes in practically all States of the Union. The Federal Government has recognized that the American people do not approve of the monopolistic control of their industrial and economic life. Both political parties have, as I recall, upon a number of occasions, declared in their platforms against monopolies and organizations in restraint of trade. I had the honor to write a plank appearing in the Democratic platform for 1924, in which private monopolies were denounced. A paragraph in the platform dealing with this subject reads as follows:

> We declare that a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable, and pledge the Democratic Party to a vigorous enforcement of existing laws against monopoly and illegal combinations, and to the enactment of such further measures as may be necessary.

A number of years ago private monopoly had gained such proportions that it threatened our industrial life. It destroyed competition and ruined thousands of individuals who were engaged in legitimate business enterprises in various parts of the United States. Corporations possessing large capital merged, and united with other corporations, for the monopolistic control of various industrial activities.

Practically all the fields of industry were invaded by organizations seeking monopolistic control of production and commodities, and, indeed, of the industrial life of the country. These giant organizations, it was believed, were a menace not only to the economic life of the country but to its political structure. As a result of the predatory operations of monopolies and trusts Congress was compelled to take some action. Leading statesmen in both political parties recognized the evils of private monopoly and united in framing a statute which it was hoped would put hooks into the jaws of these giant organizations and destroy the monopolistic control of business and trade. After prolonged study of the situation a measure was enacted into law which we call the Sherman antitrust law. My recollection is that Mr. Sherman introduced a bill, and out of it grew the present law which bears his name. The fact, however, is that the so-called "Sherman antitrust law" was drafted by Senator Hoar, one of the great leaders of the Republican Party in his day.

Powerful as monopolies were at the time the Sherman antitrust law was enacted, they increased in strength and power after the passage of the law. Its provisions were often flagrantly violated, and it did not meet the demands of the people or accomplish the results for which it was enacted. Perhaps its failure to repress monopolies and prevent restraints in trade and commerce was in part due to the failure of the executive branch of the Government to resolutely and sincerely address itself to the enforcement of its provisions. Certain it is that many complaints against organizations which were violating the antitrust law were ignored.

The fact is that the enforcement of the law was so lax that monopolies which were within the letter and spirit of the law paid but little attention to its provisions. Undoubtedly this indifference was in part due to decisions of the courts which, in my opinion, not only weakened the law but materially modified its terms.

In one of the most important cases brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan gave indication of the results which would follow the interpretation placed upon the statute by a majority of the members of the Court. Other decisions since then have done much to make the law ineffective.

Before the recent depression it is not inaccurate to say that trusts and monopolies flourished in the United States as never before, and that but little fear of prosecution seemed to be evinced by great capitalistic organizations which exercised monopolistic control of important branches of industry.

Mr. President, it is important, of course, that no improper obstacles be interposed to legitimate business activities. It is important that governments do not interfere in the legitimate activities of either individuals or corporations. It is highly important, however, that under our form of government, and with our political concepts, monopolies shall not be permitted to dominate our industrial and economic life. There must be opportunity afforded to the enterprising and courageous man to engage in business and to make his contribution to the economic development of our country. Trade and commerce must not be restrained and monopoly must not strangle legitimate enterprises.

Mr. President, when monopoly controls industry a fictitious condition is developed; there may be temporary and apparent prosperity, but the seeds of evil are sown from which are developed perils—social, economic, and political. In my opinion, the selfish course of some corporations, large enterprises and monopolistic organizations, materially contributed to the depression which came upon us in the closing days of 1929. Illegal and unsound policies upon the part of banks, investment companies, corporations, and large aggregations of wealth played an important part in bringing about the calamitous conditions from which the American people now suffer. It would be unfortunate if the measure before us became a refuge for monopolies or contributed to the monopolistic control of the products of agriculture. The purpose of this measure should be not to build up monopolies but in a practical way to aid the farmers of the United States. It is obvious that there cannot be a revival of prosperity so long as commodity prices are at the present low level. The only justification that can be urged for the enactment of the pending measure is that agriculture is prostrate, farmers are bankrupt, and many of them are being deprived of their homes and their entire estate. It is conceded that for the country to be prosperous, prosperity must follow the labors of the farmers. For many years Republican legislation was chiefly concerned in promoting the welfare of certain favored industries.

The farmers were deluded into the belief that they must support Republican tariff measures which were specially designed to augment the profits of many of the industrial organizations of the country. The gulf between the so-called "industries and agriculture" became wider as special privileges were granted through legislation to favored industries. At last agriculture awakened to the fact that the legislation to which I have referred had created or at least had contributed to the growth of trusts and monopolies, and that the farmers had been the victims of such legislation. Following the legislation to which I have referred agriculture languished, and the farmers of our country were overwhelmed with debt and reduced to a most deplorable condition. This measure may not achieve what some expect, but its proponents claim that its purpose is to lift the crushing burden resting upon the agriculture of our country, increase the prices of farm products, thus increasing the purchasing power, which it is contended will be an important factor in reviving business and opening the door of prosperity to the American people.

Mr. President, may I revert very briefly to the question of monopoly to which I referred. Senators will recall that Mr. Bryan was a foe to monopoly and denounced the monopolistic activities of big business. He and others familiar with the dangers of monopolistic control of industry predicted that the growth of monopoly would result in the growth of Socialism. It is not paradoxical that monopolistic control of industry contributes in a material way to the development of Socialism.

The American people do not desire a socialistic government, but there are many who would prefer governmental control or ownership, or both, of industry, especially the key industries of our country, to a tyrannous and oppressive monopolistic control by gigantic corporations or groups of individuals. Private monopolies will inevitably create industrial and political unrest. Notwithstanding the beneficial purpose of the measure before us, there are provisions which are so unique that they may be regarded as revolutionary and occasion some misgivings as to their efficacy in ameliorating the condition of agriculture. However, as stated, the tragic condition of agriculture, and for that matter, of the country generally, justifies the adoption of policies that may not have found favor in the past. Speaking for myself, I have doubts as to the success of the plan contemplated, and I am not free from serious apprehensions as to the consequences which will follow the execution of the provisions of the bill when it shall be enacted into law.

However, it is not my purpose to discuss the bill or the measure, or point out some of the provisions which to my mind are of dubious propriety. The Senator from Nebraska, during a discussion of other provisions of the bill, indicated that he believed that because of its experimental character it would have been better to restrict the operations of the bill to agricultural commodities only, namely, wheat and cotton. Undoubtedly, the measure would have been more easily administered with but two basic commodities incorporated within its provisions. The machinery required to carry out the provisions of the bill in its present form, I fear, would be enormous and unwieldy. However, the Senate, wisely or unwisely, has thus far determined to bring within the terms of the bill other so-called "basic" commodities.

As indicative of the doubts of many persons as to the soundness or wisdom of the measure, I refer to the fact that the cattle and sheep industry, as stated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], with practical unanimity, objected to having the bill apply to that industry.

But, returning to subdivision 2, I am inclined to think the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, as it was finally perfected, will make the provision less objectionable. As I understand the perfected amendment, it is that any of the agreements with processors, associations, or producers, and so forth, entered into between them and the Secretary of Agriculture shall not be held to be violations of the antitrust laws provided such agreements are legal. If I understand the amendment, it declares that though agreements may be entered into between the processors and the Government, they must be legal agreements in order that the processors may be immune from prosecution for a violation of the antitrust laws. That means, if I understand the amendment, that agreements entered into between processors and the Government must be legal.

However, another interpretation may be placed upon the amendment, and it may be contended that the words "legal agreements" as used in the amendment have a different significance and are not related in any way to antitrust laws. It may be contended that the word "legal" has a narrower meaning and is intended to cover only those factors or elements in contracts coming under the designation of deceit or fraudulent representation, and so forth. I cannot help feeling some concern in regard to subdivision 2.

There is an extensive propaganda in the United States to repeal all antitrust laws. It may be possible that other industries may seek relief from the provisions of the antitrust laws and support their requests by contending that the provisions of subdivision 2 modify the antitrust laws in behalf of a large part of the business of our country. The Senator from Maryland a few moments ago propounded a question which recognizes the concern which I have just expressed. He asked whether other industries than those brought within the terms of this bill would not insist that they be relieved from the operations of the antitrust laws. There is no doubt that special legislation is provocative of controversy and distrust. If one industry is relieved from the penalties following violations of the antitrust laws, another industry will feel justified in demanding the same immunity.

I can see some reason for authority to enter into contracts between processors and the Government. But it seems to me that there would be so much danger if the Government should make contracts that would permit some to engage in monopolistic activities for the purpose of controlling prices and imposing upon the consumers exactions that would be oppressive and wholly unjust, that the representatives of the Government would hesitate to enter into agreements of that character. I think this provision should receive most careful consideration, to the end that amendments may be offered if required that will make monopolistic control of the commodities provided for in the bill being brought within the control of the people from whom would be exacted extortionate prices for the commodities which they are compelled to purchase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	King	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Dickinson	Logan	Schall
Bailey	Dieterich	Lonergan	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Long	Shipstead
Barbour	Duffy	McAdoo	Smith
Barkley	Erickson	McCarran	Steiwer
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Stephens
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	George	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Murphy	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Neely	Tydings
Byrd	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Hatfield	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hayden	Overton	Walcott
Carey	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Clark	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Kean	Pope	White
Coolidge	Kendrick	Reed
Copeland	Keyes	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DILL in the chair). Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama, in effect, consented to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the modified amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has the Senator from Alabama modified it?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; as I understand.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether the word "legal" was added to his amendment? I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The modified amendment reads as follows:

> The making of any such legal agreement shall not be held to be a violation of any of the antitrust laws of the United States: Provided, That no such agreement shall remain in force after the termination of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the other day an amendment was made, but the communication sent down from the Department did not specify where it should be inserted in the bill. The amendment was to the effect that in the case of cotton the tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected at the time the goods are invoiced for sale by the processor. I should be glad to be informed where that amendment was added to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is found on page 11, line 1.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Department says:

> There was adopted an amendment to the effect that "in the case of cotton the tax shall be levied, assessed, and collected at the time that the goods are invoiced for sale by the processor." This will make administration of the act exceedingly difficult and may postpone the payment of the tax for a very considerable period.

One can readily see how the article would be processed, manufactured into the form of goods, and then perhaps for 6 months or a year the goods not invoiced or shipped out; and if the farmer is to receive the benefit intended, if the payment shall be delayed, the administration of the law will be very difficult. I am sorry that my colleague, who is the author of the amendment, is not here, but I really think that the amendment should be eliminated for the reasons set forth by the Department of Agriculture. Therefore, as my colleague is not present, I will enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator wants that motion to be entered?

Mr. SMITH. I want the motion entered. I may also say that an amendment was agreed to yesterday providing that the administrative expenses should not in any year exceed 5 percent of the amount of the proceeds of the tax collected during that year. The comment of the department is that this will probably greatly hamper the administration of the act. It will be remembered there was a record vote on the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, who makes the comment to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMITH. It is sent to us by the Department of Agriculture. I do not know who made the comment; I presume the Secretary.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does this communication from the Department state what proportion of the tax collected they think should be expended for the administration?

Mr. SMITH. It does not indicate. I think in all justice to the Department, if this measure is to pass and become effective, it will be a matter of impossibility for anyone to estimate what percentage will be necessary to put it into operation. I am just carrying out the suggestions which have been made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It is rather extraordinary to ask us to pass a bill when we cannot estimate how much it is going to cost to execute it.

Mr. SMITH. That is left for the Senate to judge, because it is impossible to know what commodities covered in the bill are going to be processed, what use is to be made of the leasing plan, what use is to be made of the cost of production plan, or what percentage of all of them may be used. I do not see any way by which an estimate can be made. That was a matter which was not definitely settled, but it was discussed in the committee, and the committee reached the conclusion that there should be no definite estimate. It is along the line suggested by the Senator from Nebraska this morning that we have to take some things on faith.

Mr. BORAH. But not all things.

Mr. SMITH. No. This is approximating that.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, is this in regard to the amendment limiting the expenditures to 5 percent?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. Is it estimated that 5 percent will not be enough?

Mr. SMITH. The Department does not make any intimation at all. They have said it would make the administration difficult.

Mr. FRAZIER. It seems to me the limit should stay in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further amendments to be offered to the bill?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, so far as I now know the amendments to part 1, title 1, have been completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further amendments to part 1, title I?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. What disposition was made of the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was simply noted as entered.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not desire to have it disposed of at this time?

Mr. SMITH. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Missouri offers the following amendment:

On page 3, line 8, to insert a new paragraph, to be known as paragraph (4), as follows:

"(4) To so advance the price of farm products within the next 2 years that the farmers of the United States shall receive an average return upon their plant investment equal to 4 percent of the value thereof and an average return for their labor equal to the average wage scales of unskilled labor in the United States."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the declaration of policy in the bill, and is offered on the theory that if price fixing may be successfully accomplished in this country we should fix prices at a point where they will do the farmer some good.

Everybody knows that for a number of years—in fact, every year since the war—farm operations in the United States have been conducted at an actual loss. As long ago as 1928 Dr. Virgil Jordan, the president of the Industrial Conference Board of New York, which is a subsidiary of big business, certainly not unduly favorable to the farmer, in a speech in Chicago used this language:

This means that the industry (agriculture) as a whole in the last crop year fell short more than $5,000,000,000 of paying its way as a going concern. We know, of course, that the industry is not earning its way as a going concern, and has not been for many years since the war.

Of course, the theory of this amendment is entirely novel, but no more novel than the theory of the whole bill. It is as definite as any portion of the bill. I realize that the amendment announces a policy rather than something which can be made a matter of definite law, but in this respect I think it somewhat clarifies the so-called "Simpson amendment", as amended by the Frazier amendment, which was adopted last week. If it be true that agriculture is, as I believe, the basic industry of the Nation, and that the prosperity of the Nation depends absolutely upon the farmer's continuous buying power, then the general objective which this amendment has in view is the least we can assure the farmer in the years to come. If prices can be fixed, they should be fixed at a point where it will be some real benefit to the farmer.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, once upon a time a prolonged funeral ceremony was held in a certain community in the far West. "The resurrection" was the subject of the funeral oration. After the minister had preached more than 3 hours, the undertaker became so irritatingly restless that the preacher said to him, "What is the matter with you?" The undertaker replied, "If you do not stop talking, I shall not be able to bury the corpse in time for the resurrection."

The farm relief bill has been the subject of the Senate's deliberation for 13 days. If we do not soon conclude our debate and pass the bill, the victims of our delay will not be buried in time to respond to Gabriel's trumpet call.

Mr. President, for more than 12 long, lagging, weary years the all-devouring merciless monsters of rising taxes and falling prices of agricultural products have scourged the farmers of this country and desolated those who till the soil. In the heyday of our long-boasted prosperity, prior to October 1929, when labor was lucratively employed; when manufacturers were annually doubling their wealth; when multitudes of executives of big business were receiving bonuses ranging from a hundred thousand dollars to more than a million dollars a year; when shrewd promoters of great mergers and audacious gamblers on the stock exchange were, with the rapidity of lightning, amassing fabulous fortunes, our farmers, because of discriminatory legislation against them and through no fault of their own, were growing poorer and poorer every hour.

The farmer's distressing plight was impressively emphasized on the floor of the Senate more than 5 years ago by the able senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] who directed attention to the fact that in a single issue of a newspaper published in his State more than 6,000 farms were advertised for sale for the nonpayment of taxes. Sad to relate, almost every other State in the Union has witnessed agricultural tragedies similar to those reported from the State of Idaho.

In the last three Presidential campaigns both of the major political parties recognized agriculture's adversity; that the farmers, generally, were on the road to bankruptcy and that vast numbers of them had already reached that doleful destination. Both great political parties have long promised effective Federal farm relief. During the last decade many experiments were made in behalf of agriculture and manifold measures were adopted for the relief of its ills. But in spite of the countless efforts that have been made to place the farming industry, which is the indispensable foundation of every other legitimate business, upon a basis of prosperity, thousands of American farms are being sold every day in satisfaction of mortgages or taxes, which the landowners cannot possibly pay. There is scarcely a rural community in the United States in which faultless farmers are not too poor to supply decent clothes for their wives to wear to church or for their children to wear to school. Every day the farmer's burdens become more intolerable; every day the farmer's troubles increase like the multiplication table; every day the farmers reach some new depth of despair.

Only once before in the entire history of the world was a farmer ever distressed as the American farmer has been bedeviled and distressed during the last 4 years. That was on the memorable occasion upon which the Sabeans stole farmer Job's oxen and asses; the Chaldeans carried away his camels and slew his servants; the fire of God burned up his sheep; and the devil infamously covered the patient old patriarch with agonizing boils from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet.

The Roosevelt administration has promptly, wisely, and sympathetically undertaken to save the tillers of the soil. With praiseworthy industry and commendable zeal the administration has prepared comprehensive legislation for the relief of the farmers' distress. That legislation is now before the Senate. The proposals which it contains are necessarily experimental. But an element of experimentation alone affords no justification for opposition to this or any other great undertaking. But for experiments we should not have the steamboat, the railroad train, the automobile, the airplane, the telegraph, the telephone, the radio, or any of the other countless curious inventions or innumerable cunning devices which diminish the burdens, mitigate the suffering, and increase the joys of life. Experiments, and courageous experiments, are now imperatively demanded by the most disastrous conditions that have ever confronted civilization.

Those who still cling to the antiquated, discredited, inhuman doctrine of "laissez faire" vigorously oppose the pending bill and offer numerous excuses for not supporting it. They assign many alleged reasons why we should let well enough alone. But when the farmers are bankrupt, when 14,000,000 toilers are unemployed, and millions of others are threatened with starvation, conditions are not well enough to let alone. They are not well enough to permit any thoughtful, patriotic person to hesitate or slumber or sleep until our every available resource shall have been exhausted, if necessary, in behalf of the restoration of Nation-wide prosperity. Those who have determined that the American people and their Government shall not perish must try experiments again and again until their efforts are crowned with success.

The carefully prepared and vigorously delivered addresses of the senior Senators from Delaware and Pennsylvania state, or at least suggest, all the infinitudes of opposition to the pending measure.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who has discussed the bill at great length, believes that we should remain where we are, and have been for the last 4 years, until we are assured of an easy road and a safe journey to some happy "promised land." He would rather continue submissively to suffer the innumerable slings and arrows of the past's outrageous fortune than to hazard a bold effort to obtain valuable rewards in the present and great blessings in the future. He apparently holds in utter contempt Pompey's admonition to Scylla to remember that more worship the rising than the setting sun.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is opposed to the bill because it conflicts with the customs of the days of old and the practices of the bygone years. He believes that the enactment of the legislation will violate the revered provisions of our sacrosanct Constitution.

But many other Senators refuse to concur in the opinions expressed by these wise men of the East. Many other Senators possess enough courage and are blessed with enough faith in the Democratic President who has proposed this legislation to help translate it into a realization. Fortunately for the impoverished farmers and all others who are in distress, many Members on each side of the Senate aisle approve the wisdom and emulate the courage which the President so magnificently manifests and which are so eloquently revealed in Mr. Lowell's famous lines:

> My soul is not a palace of the past,
> Where outworn creeds, like Rome's grey senate, quake,
> Hearing afar the Vandal's trumpet hoarse,
> That shakes old systems with a thunder-fit.
> The time is ripe, and rotten-ripe, for change;
> Then let it come: I have no dread of what
> Is called for by the instinct of mankind,
> Nor think I that God's world would fall apart
> Because we tear a parchment more or less

We cannot demonstrate with the certainty of the solution of a mathematical problem that this legislation will produce all of the results which every good citizen devoutly wishes in behalf of the suffering farmers; we cannot demonstrate that it will prove entirely satisfactory to all of those who till the soil. But since the administration's economic and agricultural experts endorse it, since the President approves it and the farmers, through the spokesmen of their organizations, certify that it provides a panacea for agriculture's devastating ills, let us unhesitatingly support it in the fervent hope that it will restore the prosperity and happiness of the average farmer until he can once more—

> Wrap the drapery of his couch about him
> And lie down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I had yielded the floor, but I shall gladly endeavor to answer any question the able Senator from Colorado may ask me.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, one phase of the eloquent address of the Senator from West Virginia specially interested me. For a generation much of the mechanical genius of America has been devoted to the automotive industry. If anything goes wrong with an automobile in any part of America, qualified men spring to effective assistance for the driver. I am wondering whether the able Senator from West Virginia has any explanation of the unwillingness of men in such a country to apply experimental and pioneering genius to the adaptation of government to the changing needs of human beings?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in my opinion the reason why men of genius do not generally apply themselves to the solution of the farmers' problems is found in the fact that the business world offers them greater compensation for their services than agriculture can afford to pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I inquire if we have concluded the consideration of title I of the pending bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Title I is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for title II of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I know of no other amendment to title I. I think we may now proceed to title II.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute for title II of the bill. The amendment embodies the so-called "farm mortgage bill" as reported for the favorable consideration of the Senate by the Banking and Currency Committee. That committee has authorized me to offer that bill as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for title II of the agricultural relief bill, and, with the indulgence of the Senate, I should like—I hope in not too long a time—to present some facts as to the background of this proposal, and then explain the important features of it, after which I will be quite willing to answer, if I can, such questions in regard to the details of its provisions as Senators may care to propound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York in the nature of a substitute will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WAGNER is, on page 27, beginning with line 7, to strike out through line 5, on page 43, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE II—AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

Part 1. Amendments to Federal Farm Loan Act

ISSUANCE OF BONDS BY LAND BANKS

SEC. 21. Section 32 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 991), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Until such time as the Farm Loan Commissioner determines that Federal farm-loan bonds (other than those issued under this paragraph) are readily salable in the open market at a yield not in excess of 4 percent per annum, but in no case more than 2 years after this paragraph takes effect, Federal land banks may issue farm-loan bonds as authorized under this act, for the purpose of making new loans, or for purchasing mortgages or exchanging bonds for mortgages as provided in paragraph 'Second' of section 13 of this act. The aggregate amount of the bonds issued under this paragraph shall not exceed $2,000,000,000, and such bonds shall be issued in such denominations as the Farm Loan Commissioner shall prescribe, shall bear interest at a rate not in excess of 4 percent per annum, and shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed as to interest by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof. In the event that the issuing bank or banks shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the interest on any such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Upon the payment of such interest by the Secretary of the Treasury the amount so paid shall become an obligation to the United States of the issuing bank or banks and shall bear interest at the same rate as that borne by the bonds upon which the interest has been so paid. After the expiration of 1 year from the date this paragraph takes effect, if in the opinion of the Farm Loan Commissioner any part of the proceeds of the bonds authorized to be issued under this paragraph is not required for the purpose of making new loans or for purchasing mortgages or exchanging bonds for mortgages as herein provided, such bonds may be issued within the maximum limit herein specified for the purpose of refinancing any outstanding issues of Federal farm-loan bonds; but no such bonds shall be issued after 2 years from the date this paragraph takes effect for the purpose of such refinancing."

PURCHASE, REDUCTION, AND REFINANCING OF FARM MORTGAGES

SEC. 22. Paragraph "Second" of section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Second. In order to reduce and/or refinance farm mortgages, to invest such funds as may be in its possession in the purchase of qualified first mortgages on farm lands situated within the Federal land-bank district within which it is organized or for which it is acting, or to exchange farm-loan bonds for any duly recorded first mortgages on farm lands executed prior to the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect, at a price which shall not exceed in each individual case the amount of the unpaid principal of the mortgage on the date of such purchase or exchange, or 50 percent of the value of the land mortgaged and 20 percent of the value of the permanent insured improvements thereon as determined upon an appraisal made pursuant to this act, whichever is the smaller: Provided, That any mortgagor whose mortgage is acquired by a Federal land bank under this paragraph shall be entitled to have his farm-mortgage indebtedness refinanced in accordance with the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of this act on the basis of the amount paid by the bank for his mortgage."

EXTENSION OF LOANS

SEC. 23. Paragraph "Tenth" of section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 781), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The terms of any such extension shall be such as will not defer the collection of any obligation due by any borrower which, after investigation by the bank of the situation of such borrower, is shown to be within his capacity to meet. In the case of any such extension made prior to the expiration of 5 years from the date this paragraph, as amended, takes effect, or in the case of any deferment of principal as provided in paragraph 'Twelfth' of section 12 of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on behalf of the United States, upon the request of the Federal land bank making the extension, and with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, to subscribe at such periods as the Commissioner shall determine, to the paid-in surplus of such bank an amount equal to the amount of all such extensions and deferments made by the bank during the preceding period. Such subscriptions shall be subject to call, in whole or in part, by the bank with the approval of the Commissioner upon 30 days' notice. To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make such subscriptions to the paid-in surplus of the Federal land banks, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000, to be immediately available and remain available until expended. Upon payment to any Federal land bank of the amount of any such subscription, such bank shall execute and deliver a receipt therefor to the Secretary of the Treasury in form to be prescribed by the Farm Loan Commissioner. The amount of any subscriptions to the paid-in surplus of any such bank may be repaid in whole or in part at any time in the discretion of the bank and with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, and the Commissioner may at any time require such subscriptions to be repaid in whole or in part if in his opinion the bank has resources available therefor."

REDUCTION OF INTEREST OF LOANS AND DEFERMENT OF PRINCIPAL

SEC. 24. Section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, secs. 771–772), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Twelfth. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph Second, the rate of interest on any loans on mortgage made through national farm-loan associations by any Federal land bank, outstanding on the date this paragraph takes effect or made within 2 years after such date, shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum for all interest payable on installment dates occurring within a period of 5 years commencing 60 days after the date this paragraph takes effect; and no payment of the principal portion of any installment of any such loan shall be required during such 5-year period if the borrower shall not be in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage. The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay each Federal land bank, as soon as practicable after October 1, 1933, and after the end of each quarter thereafter, such amount as the Farm Loan Commissioner certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury is equal to the amount by which interest payments on mortgages held by such bank have been reduced, during the preceding quarter, by reason of this paragraph; but in any case in which the Farm Loan Commissioner finds that the amount of interest payable by such bank during any quarter has been reduced by reason of the refinancing of bonds under section 32 of this act, the amount of the reduction so found shall be deducted from the amount payable to such bank under this paragraph. No payments shall be made to a bank with respect to any period after June 30, 1938. There is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000,000 for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to make payments to Federal land banks which accrue during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and such additional amounts as may be necessary to make payments accruing during subsequent fiscal years.

INCREASE OF AMOUNT OF LOANS TO BORROWERS

SEC. 25. Paragraph "Seventh" of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 771) (relating to the limitations as to amount of loans), is amended by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$50,000, but loans to any one borrower shall not exceed $25,000 unless approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner."

DIRECT LOANS

SEC. 26. Section 7 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the last paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraphs:

"Whenever it shall appear to the Farm Loan Commissioner that national farm-loan associations have not been formed in any locality in the continental United States, or that the farmers residing in the territory covered by the charter of a national farm-loan association are unable to apply to the Federal land bank of the district for loans on account of the inability of the bank to accept applications from such association, the Farm Loan Commissioner may, in his discretion, authorize said bank to make direct loans to borrowers secured by first mortgages on farm lands situated within any such locality or territory. Except as herein otherwise specifically provided, all provisions of this act applicable with respect to loans made through national farm-loan associations shall, insofar as practicable, apply with respect to such direct loans, and the Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary with respect to such direct loans.

"The rate of interest on such direct loans made at any time by any Federal land bank shall be one half of 1 percent per annum in excess of the rate of interest charged to borrowers on mortgage loans made at such time by the bank through national farm-loan associations.

"Each borrower who obtains a direct loan from a Federal land bank shall subscribe and pay for stock in such bank in the sum of $5 for each $100 or fraction thereof borrowed. Such stock shall be held by such Federal land bank as collateral security for the loan of the borrower and shall participate in all dividends. Upon full payment of the loan such stock shall, if still outstanding, be canceled at par, or, in the event that such stock shall have become impaired, at the estimated value thereof as approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the borrower.

"Each such borrower shall convenant in his mortgage that, whenever there are 10 or more borrowers who have obtained from a Federal land bank direct loans under the provisions of this section aggregating not less than $20,000, and who reside in a locality which may, in the opinion of the Farm Loan Commissioner, be conveniently covered by the charter of and served by a national farm-loan association, he will unite with such other borrowers to form a national farm-loan association. Such borrowers shall organize the association subject to the requirements and the conditions specified in this section, so far as the same may be applicable, and in accordance with rules and regulations of the Farm Loan Commissioner. As soon as the organization of the association has been approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner, the stock in the Federal land bank held by each of the members of such association shall be canceled at par, and in lieu thereof the bank shall issue in the name of the association an equal amount of stock in said bank, which stock shall be held by said bank as collateral security as provided in this section with respect to other loans through national farm-loan associations. Thereupon there shall be issued to each such member an amount of capital stock in the association equal to the amount which he previously held in said bank, which stock shall be held by said association as collateral security as provided in section 8 of this act. The board of directors of said association shall adopt a resolution authorizing and directing its secretary-treasurer on behalf of said association to endorse, and thereby become liable for the payment of, the mortgages taken from its charter members by the Federal land bank. When it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Farm Loan Commissioner that all the foregoing conditions have been complied with, and upon the granting of the charter by the Farm Loan Commissioner, the interest rate paid by each charter member of such association whose loan is in good standing shall, beginning with his next regular installment date, be reduced to the rate of interest paid by borrowers on new loans made through national farm-loan associations in the same Federal land bank district at the time the said loan was made to such charter member.

"Charges to be paid by applicants for direct loans from a Federal land bank shall not exceed amounts to be fixed by the Farm Loan Commissioner and shall in no case exceed the charges which may be made to applicants for loans and borrowers through national farm-loan associations under the provisions of sections 11 and 13 of this act."

LOANS TO RECEIVERS

SEC. 27. Any receiver appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board pursuant to section 29 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is authorized, for the purpose of paying taxes on farm real estate owned by the bank or securing the mortgages held by it, with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to issue receiver's certificates against the assets of such bank as security for any loan received from the corporation under this section, and such certificates shall constitute a prior lien on such assets. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans to such receivers for the purposes of this section.

Part 2. Joint-stock land banks

LIMITATIONS ON ISSUE OF BONDS AND LENDING

SEC. 28. After the date of enactment of this act no joint-stock land bank shall issue any tax-exempt bonds or make any farm loans except such as are necessary and incidental to the refinancing of existing loans or bond issues or to the sale of any real estate now owned or hereafter acquired by such bank.

LOANS TO JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS TO PROVIDE FOR ORDERLY LIQUIDATION

SEC. 29. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner, out of the funds of the Corporation, the sum of $100,000,000, to be used, for a period not exceeding 2 years from the date of enactment of this act, for the purpose of making loans to the joint-stock land banks organized and doing business under the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent per annum, payable annually. Such loans shall be made upon application therefor by such banks and upon compliance with the requirements of this section. The amount which may be loaned hereunder to any such bank shall not exceed an amount having the same proportion to the said $100,000,000 as the unpaid principal of the mortgages held by such bank on the date of enactment of this act bears to the total amount of the unpaid principal of the mortgages held by all the joint-stock land banks on such date.

(b) Any joint-stock land bank applying for a loan under this section shall deliver to the Farm Loan Commissioner as collateral security therefor first mortgages or purchase-money mortgages on farm lands, first mortgages on farm real estate owned by the bank in fee simple, or such other collateral as may be available to said bank, including sales contracts and sheriff's certificates on farm lands. The real estate upon which such collateral is based shall be appraised by appraisers appointed under the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, and the borrowing bank shall be entitled to borrow not to exceed 60 percent of the value of such real estate as determined by such appraisal. Fees for such appraisals shall be paid by the applicant banks in such amounts as may be fixed by the Farm Loan Commissioner. No such loan shall be made until the applicant bank, under regulations to be prescribed by the Farm Loan Commissioner, (1) shall have agreed to grant to each borrower then indebted to the bank under the terms of a first mortgage a reduction to 5 percent per annum in the rate of interest specified in such mortgage, beginning at his next regular installment date occurring more than 60 days after the date of enactment of this act, and (2) shall have agreed to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that during a period of 2 years from the date of enactment of this act the bank will not proceed against the mortgagor on account of default in the payment of interest or principal due under the terms of its mortgage and will not foreclose its mortgage unless the property covered by such mortgage is abandoned by the mortgagor or unless, in the opinion of the Commissioner, such foreclosure is necessary for other reasons.

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION TO JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS FOR EMERGENCY PURPOSES

SEC. 30. (a) In addition to loans authorized to be made to joint-stock land banks as provided in section 202 of this act and as provided in section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 percent per annum, to any joint-stock land bank for the purpose of securing the postponement for 2 years from the date of the enactment of this act of the foreclosure of first mortgages held by such banks on account of (1) default in the payment of interest and principal due under the terms of the mortgage, and (2) unpaid delinquent taxes, excluding interest and penalties, which may be secured by the lien of said mortgage: Provided, That during the period of postponement of foreclosure such bank shall charge the mortgagor interest at a rate not exceeding 4 percent per annum on the aggregate amount of such delinquent taxes and defaulted interest and principal with respect to which loans are made pursuant to this section. The amount loaned to any joint-stock land bank under this section shall be made without reappraisal: Provided, That the amount loaned with respect to any mortgage on account of unpaid principal shall not exceed 5 percent of the total unpaid principal of such mortgage, and the total amount loaned to any such land bank with respect to any mortgage shall not exceed 25 percent of the total unpaid principal of such mortgage. The aggregate amount of the loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under this section shall not exceed $25,000,000.

(b) No such loan shall be made with respect to any mortgage unless the Corporation is satisfied that the mortgagor, after exercising ordinary diligence to pay his accrued delinquent taxes and meet accrued interest and principal payments, has defaulted thereon; and unless the bank shall have agreed to the satisfaction of the Corporation that during such 2-year period the bank will not foreclose such mortgage unless the property covered thereby is abandoned by the mortgagor or unless in the opinion of the Corporation such foreclosure is necessary for other reasons.

(c) Each such loan shall be secured by an assignment to the Corporation of the lien of the taxes and/or of the bank's mortgage with respect to which the loan is made: Provided, That the part of each such lien so assigned representing the interest and principal due and unpaid in any such mortgage which has been assigned to the farm loan registrar shall be subordinate to the existing lien of the bank for the balance of the indebtedness then or thereafter to become due under the terms of such mortgage; but the Corporation may require the bank to furnish additional collateral as security for such loan, if such collateral is available to the bank.

(d) The Corporation is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section and to make the relief contemplated immediately available.

Part 3. Loans to farmers by Farm Loan Commissioner

REDUCTION OF DEBTS AND REDEMPTION OF FORECLOSED FARMS

SEC. 31. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to allocate and make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner the sum of $200,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used for the purpose of making loans as hereinafter provided to any farmer, secured by a first or second mortgage upon the whole or any part of the farm property, real or personal, including crops, of the farmer. The amount of the mortgage given by any farmer, together with all prior mortgages or other evidences of indebtedness secured by such farm property of the farmer, shall not exceed 75 percent of the value thereof, as determined upon an appraisal made pursuant to the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended; nor shall a loan in excess of $5,000 be made to any one farmer. Every mortgage made under this section shall contain an agreement providing for the repayment of the loan on an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual or semiannual installments, sufficient to cover (1) interest on unpaid principal at a rate not to exceed 5 percent per annum and (2) such payments equal in amount to be applied on principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period of not more than 10 years from the date the first payment on principal is due: Provided, That during the first 3 years the loan is in effect payments of interest only may be required. No loan shall be made under this section unless the holder of any prior mortgage or instrument of indebtedness secured by such farm property arranges to the satisfaction of the Farm Loan Commissioner to limit his right to proceed against the farmer and such farm property for default in payment of principal. Loans under this section shall be made for the following purposes only: (1) Refinancing, either in connection with proceedings under chapter VIII of the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, as amended (relating to agricultural compositions and extensions), or otherwise, any indebtedness, secured or unsecured, of the farmer, (2) providing working capital for his farm operations, and (3) enabling any farmer to redeem and/or repurchase farm property owned by him and occupied by him as a home prior to foreclosure, which has been foreclosed within 1 year prior to the enactment of this act or which is foreclosed after the enactment of this act. The provisions of paragraph "Ninth" of section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (relating to charges to applicants for loans and borrowers from the Federal land banks), shall, so far as practicable, apply to loans made under this section. As used in this section, the term "farmer" means any individual who is bona fide engaged in farming operations, either personally or through an agent or tenant, or the principal part of whose income is derived from farming operations, and includes a personal representative of a deceased farmer.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 32. The Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make such rules and regulations and to appoint such agents as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title and to make the relief contemplated by this title immediately available.

FACILITIES OF FEDERAL LAND BANKS AND NATIONAL FARM LOAN ASSOCIATIONS MADE AVAILABLE

SEC. 33. The Federal land banks and the national farm loan associations are authorized, upon request of the Farm Loan Commissioner, to make available to him their services and facilities to aid in administering the provisions of this title.

PENALTIES

SEC. 34. Any person who shall knowingly make any material false representation for the purpose of obtaining any loan under part 3 of this title, or in assisting in obtaining any such loan, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both.

Part 4. Refinancing of agricultural improvement district indebtedness for the benefit of farmers

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

SEC. 35. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000, to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts, duly organized under the laws of any State, and to political subdivisions of States, which, prior to the date of enactment of this act have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of land for agricultural purposes. Such loans shall be made for the purpose of enabling any such district or political subdivision (hereafter referred to as the "borrower") to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness incurred in connection with any such project, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; except that (1) the term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years; (2) each such loan shall be secured by refunding bonds issued to the Corporation by the borrower which are a lien on the real property within the project or on the amount of the assessments levied on such property by the borrower pursuant to State law, or by such other collateral as may be acceptable to the Corporation; (3) the borrower shall agree not to issue during the term of the loan any bonds so secured except with the consent of the Corporation; (4) the borrower shall pay to the Corporation, until all bonds of the borrower held by the Corporation are retired, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments against the real property within the project collected by the borrower exceed the costs of operation and maintenance of the project and interest on its outstanding obligations; and (5) the borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce the outstanding indebtedness to the borrower of the landowners within such project by an amount corresponding to that by which the indebtedness of the borrower is reduced by reason of the operation of this section, to distribute the amount of such reduction among such landowners on a pro-rata basis, to cancel and retire its outstanding bonds in an aggregate amount equal to the amount of the reduction so distributed, and to permit the Corporation, in the case of the payment of the bonds of the borrower or the liquidation of such project, to participate in such payment or in the proceeds of such liquidation on the basis of the face amount of the bonds so retired plus the face amount of the bonds held by the Corporation as security for the loan. No loan shall be made under this section until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (A) has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing and/or underlying the outstanding bonds of the applicant, (B) has determined that the project of the applicant is economically sound, and (C) has been satisfied that an agreement has been entered into between the applicant and the holders of its outstanding bonds under which the applicant will be able to purchase or refund such bonds at a price determined by the Corporation to be reasonable after taking into consideration the average market price of such bonds over the 6 months' period ending March 1, 1933, and under which a substantial reduction will be brought about in the amount of the outstanding indebtedness of the applicant.

Part 5. Increase of lending power of Reconstruction Finance Corporation

SEC. 36. In order to provide funds to carry out the purposes of this title, the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to have outstanding at any one time is hereby increased by $300,000,000.

Part 6. Functions of Farm Loan Commissioner under Executive orders

SEC. 37. If and when any Executive order heretofore transmitted to the Congress pursuant to title IV of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act of 1933, as amended, shall become effective, all functions, powers, authority, and duties conferred upon or vested in the Farm Loan Commissioner by this title shall be held and exercised by him subject to all the terms and conditions in any such Executive order the same as if such functions, powers, authority, and duties were specifically named in such Executive order or orders.

Part 7. Short title

SEC. 38. This title may be cited as the "Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933."

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the amendment to the pending farm relief bill now tendered consists of the entire farm mortgage bill (S. 1110) as reported to the Senate by the Banking and Currency Committee. The proposal is put forward as one of the major means of bettering the lot of the farmer. It should be viewed as an integral part of the administration's program of making good its pledge to agriculture.

Month after month during the past few years Congress has discussed and portrayed the plight of the farmer oppressed by debts he could not pay, confronted by markets in which he could not sell at a profit, walking the hopeless treadmill of work without prospect of return and always in the shadow of the menace of foreclosure. The time has now come to abandon sentimental rhetoric and make an organized effort to protect that farmer and lighten his burden.

The farm-debt problem is much more than a banking question. It involves much more than the technic of finance. In exactly the same way as farming is not only an occupation but a way of life which this country desires to preserve and strengthen so is the farm-debt situation charged heavily with human considerations of life and happiness which transcend in value the factors that enter into an ordinary banking transaction.

During the 3-year period ending March 15, 1931, over 366,000 farms were foreclosed. For many of the farmers who were thus evicted that way of life, the way of individual independence, had come to an end.

Since that date the process of foreclosure and eviction has continued, only at a faster pace, hastening the separation of men from the soil, of families from their homesteads, of a generation from a mode of living in which has flowered some of the finest fruits of American civilization. How much faster the pace of foreclosure has become can be seen from the following figures: During the 12 months ending March 1, 1931, there were 26 forced sales per thousand farms. During the 12 months ending March 1, 1932, we had 41 forced sales per thousand farms. Conceivably we might shut our eyes to the elements of tragedy which enter into each of these forced sales if we could welcome to the city every farmer who was stripped of his farm in the country. But the city has offered the farmers no opportunity during the past few years except the chance to mingle with others deprived of their jobs and equally unfortunate.

That is the human side of the farm-debt question, and we must not only understand it but feel it, if we are correctly to comprehend the nature of the forceful resistance to foreclosure which is reported from various parts of the country. The farmers who engage in these demonstrations are not lawbreakers by habit; they are law-abiding citizens and as thoroughly devoted to orderly government as any element in our population. When we see these men resort to self-help and defy legal process even the most complacent must realize how deep an emotional current has been touched. These resisting farmers are moved by the same profound forces which have always driven any free people to fight for their homes. When conditions have reached that stage let no man who has a care for his country continue to proclaim his faith in "natural adjustment."

We may no longer postpone the adoption of a deliberate policy of organized adjustment of the structure of agricultural debt and finance—an adjustment which, while taking full notice of the economic realities, distributes its burdens with equity and avoids every unnecessary hardship. Directly such a policy confers a benefit on agriculture. Indirectly it contributes to the strengthening of the entire banking structure of the country; it liquefies the assets of the insurance companies; it preserves the savings of thousands of American families.

Of the entire volume of outstanding farm mortgages 23 percent is held by insurance companies, 19 percent is held by joint-stock land banks and Federal land banks, 11 percent by commercial banks, and the obligations of these institutions are held in the form of policies, bonds, or deposits by the rank and file of the American people.

It is important to remember that the farm-mortgage problem is not entirely a direct consequence of the present emergency. The growth of farm indebtedness is largely one of the legacies of the war. In 1910 the farm-mortgage debt of the United States amounted to $3,320,000,000. By 1920 it had increased 136 percent to $7,857,000,000. There was a further increase between 1920 and 1928, but relatively a moderate one—to $9,460,000,000. Today the total farm-mortgage indebtedness outstanding is approximately $8,500,000,000. Much of the decline has been accomplished through foreclosures. If we compare total indebtedness, both mortgaged and unmortgaged, we find that from 1922 to 1932 the amount has declined by almost $2,000,000,000 from $13,833,000,000 to approximately $12,000,000,000 today.

The significant inference that may be drawn from these facts is that the farmer has not been rushing madly into debt; he has not brought his present embarrassment upon himself; the large increase of farm debt occurred during the decade of the war when the farmer was encouraged to expand his operations in response to the demands of national policy.

That inference is corroborated by many facts. Thus 58 percent of the farms of the United States are entirely free of mortgage and only 15 percent of the farms are covered by mortgages representing more than 50 percent of their value; the average-sized farm loan in 1928 was only $5,205; and for farmers who owned their farms it was only $3,919.

What, then, is the meaning of the "burden of debt" as applied to the farmer? That phrase has no significance if it is used simply in reference to the size of the total indebtedness. It has no particular significance if it is employed in reference to the percentage of farm value covered by mortgage. It becomes meaningful only when measured in terms of gross farm income and the level of farm prices.

The total farm-mortgage interest bill is approximately $500,000,000 a year. It is one thing to pay that out of a gross farm income of $17,000,000,000—the figure it reached in 1919. It is quite another and far more difficult and almost insoluble problem to pay that out of a gross income which had declined to $5,000,000,000 in 1932.

Farm prices have been cut approximately in half from their pre-war average. Some of the farmer's costs have, of course, declined but not in proportion to the shrinkage in the price of the commodities he sells. The most rigid item of his costs has been the interest and principal of his indebtedness. It has stood as a fixed charge in the midst of rapidly dissolving values. The result is that many a solvent farmer whose mortgage represents but a modest fraction of the value of his property is confronted with the threat of foreclosure because he finds it impossible to meet his interest, taxes, and installments of principal.

The condition of agriculture is reflected in the condition of the rural banks. By far the largest number of bank suspensions during the past 12 years has taken place in agricultural areas. Thus, for instance, from January 1, 1921, to January 31, 1933, there were 395 bank suspensions in the Middle Atlantic States, comprising New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. That number represented 13.2 percent of all active banks within that area. During the same period fully 4,310 banks closed in the West North-Central States, comprising Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas, and that represented 47 percent of all active banks within that region. For the past 3 years the Federal land banks have been unable to borrow on long term. And this strangulation of farm credit has in turn aggravated the bad situation out of which it had arisen.

The condition we face is serious beyond description. Agricultural credit, always an indispensable ingredient of our national economy, has almost ceased to function and the longer it is out of operation the faster does the deflation proceed. Many times we thought we had struck bottom. We now realize that deflation is bottomless; that unless checked it will reduce not only the farmers but the entire Nation to unbelievable poverty.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will the Senator be good enough to explain the difference between the substitute he is offering and the original provision of the bill?

Mr. WAGNER. At the conclusion of the explanation of the substitute I have proposed I shall attempt to point out the differences between the two.

It is obvious that we can approach the farm problem from two directions. We may increase the farmer's income by means of higher prices for the commodities he sells; we may increase his income by reducing his costs, and particularly his fixed charges. The administration's program is a double-headed effort to come to the rescue of agriculture by both methods. The amendment now presented is addressed to the second.

Four major purposes are embraced within the scope of the amendment: First, to enable the Federal land bank system to obtain new capital, and thereby to resume its functioning as an effective agricultural agency; second, to reduce the burden of debt now oppressing the farmer and to lift the threat of imminent foreclosure; third, to provide for liquidating in an orderly fashion the affairs of the joint-stock land banks; fourth, to refinance the short-term indebtedness of the farmer, to provide him with working capital where necessary, and to help him redeem or repurchase his foreclosed farm home.

I desire as briefly as possible to explain the methods proposed in the amendment for the accomplishment of these purposes. It is helpful to have in mind that the amendment deals with several distinct agencies: The Federal land banks, the joint-stock land banks, the Farm Loan Commissioner, and the agricultural improvement districts.

Concerning each of these agencies separate provisions are proposed, and I believe it will promote their understanding if they are separately treated.

FEDERAL LAND BANKS

I shall consider first the Federal land banks, which now hold farm mortgages amounting to $1,150,000,000, representing about 12 percent of the total farm-mortgage indebtedness of the United States. These banks are for 2 years authorized to issue up to $2,000,000,000 of farm-loan bonds, bearing an interest rate not exceeding 4 percent per annum and carrying the guaranty of the United States as to interest.

During the first year these bonds may be issued by the Federal land banks only to acquire outstanding farm mortgages either for cash or through an exchange for bonds or to make new loans on farm mortgages. Only during the second year, if in the judgment of the Farm Loan Commissioner, bonds are not needed for these purposes, may they be used to refinance on better terms outstanding farm-loan bonds.

It is intended that the Federal land banks shall negotiate with farm creditors and acquire the mortgages they hold at a discount, and within the limitation that the price paid shall not exceed 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 per cent of the permanent improvements. The benefit of the discount must be transferred to the farmer in the form of a reduction of the principal of his mortgage—and that, Mr. President, is the first of the several direct benefits available, particularly to the distressed farmer, under the terms of the proposal.

Of course, there is no compulsion applied to the bank or other mortgagee to accept cash or bonds of a lesser face value than the amount of the mortgage. No compulsion can, under the Constitution, be applied. The committee, however, has had ample assurance and its own judgment dictates that many mortgagees will be willing to trade.

What obligation will this transaction impose upon the taxpayers? The interest guaranty upon the bonds may seem like a large commitment. It is quite inconceivable, however, that the Treasury should ever be called upon to pay. The very ample margin of security, the wide-spread geographical distribution of the mortgaged farms, the joint and several liability of the Federal land banks, the hoped-for rise in the level of commodity prices—these factors of safety all unite in assuring that the guaranty will be free of cost to the United States.

The provisions I have mentioned will apply the ax to the burden of debt now carried by the most severely oppressed group of farmers, by those whose margin of safety has gone, who are actually threatened with imminent foreclosure.

In addition, in two important sections, the amendment provides for the reduction of the current operating costs of all farmer-borrowers from the Federal land banks. These sections reduce the interest rate during the next 5 years on all outstanding and new mortgages held by the Federal land banks and made through national farm-loan associations to a rate not exceeding 4½ percent; they provide for a 5-year moratorium on the payment of installments of principal, and in deserving cases authorize a 5-year extension for the payment of interest.

Where farmers exercise the privilege given them to borrow from the Federal land banks directly without the intervention of a national farm-loan association, the interest rate is one half percent higher.

Under an amendment which is to be proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] the 4½ percent maximum rate is likewise to extend to mortgages made through agents as provided for in the Farm Loan Act or previously purchased from joint-stock land banks.

Under a further amendment by the Senator from Arkansas the rate on mortgages held by the Federal land banks through its branch in Puerto Rico is not to exceed 5 percent under an amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

These provisions, Mr. President, not only lighten the farmers' burden of debt but constitute a guaranty that every borrower whose mortgage is held or acquired by the Federal land banks will be permitted to hold onto his farm and his home and given an opportunity to ride through the storm of the present emergency.

Two appropriations are authorized in order to make possible the interest reduction and the extension and deferments which I have indicated. Fifty million dollars is authorized for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury in subscribing to the paid-in surplus of the Federal land banks to finance the deferments of principal and interest. These subscriptions are to be repaid to the Treasury in the future out of available resources.

Fifteen million dollars is authorized for the next fiscal year, and additional amounts for subsequent years, to be used in compensating the Federal land banks for the loss they sustain by reducing the mortgage interest rate during the next 5 years. This is the only unrepayable outlay called for under the amendment.

JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS

Part 2 of the amendment is designed to wind up in as orderly fashion as possible the affairs of the joint-stock land banks. Their power to issue tax-exempt bonds is terminated and they are prohibited from making any farm loans except such as may be necessary and incidental to the refinancing of existing loans, or to the liquidation of real-estate holdings. In view of the fact that joint-stock land banks were authorized to make farm loans up to $50,000, the amendment provides that the maximum limit of Federal land-bank loans shall be increased to that figure; but every loan in excess of $25,000 must have the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner.

Provision for the orderly liquidation of the joint-stock land banks is made in sections 29 and 30.

Under section 29 the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is directed to make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner $100,000,000 to be used for a period of 2 years in making loans to joint-stock land banks at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 percent per annum upon the security of first or purchase-money mortgages or other available collateral. No loan may exceed 60 percent of the appraised value of the security. In addition, two conditions are attached to every such loan which are of direct benefit to the farmer. The joint-stock land bank must first reduce the interest on all of its first mortgages to 5 percent, and, second, it must agree for a period of 2 years not to proceed against the farmer mortgagor on account of default in interest or principal, nor to foreclose the mortgage except for abandonment of the property, or where the Farm Loan Commissioner deems foreclosure necessary.

Section 30 is intended as a temporary measure, to serve until such time as the appraisals required under section 29 can be completed. It authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to joint-stock land banks aggregating not in excess of $25,000,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 percent, to finance the payment of delinquent taxes, interest, and amortization of diligent farm borrowers, on condition that the joint-stock land banks agree not to foreclose the mortgage for a period of 2 years. Under an amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, this fund is to be allocated to the Farm Loan Commissioner by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and loans are to be made through him. These loans to the joint-stock land banks are to be made without appraisal of security but are limited by the provision that loans with respect to defaulted installments of principal must not exceed 5 percent of the unpaid principal, and that loans to finance all delinquent items must not exceed 25 percent of the unpaid principal.

From the point of view of the joint-stock land banks and their bondholders, these provisions mean the avoidance of receivership. From the viewpoint of the farmer indebted to the joint-stock land banks, they mean the reduction in interest and assurance against foreclosure for 2 years.

DIRECT LOANS BY FARM LOAN COMMISSIONER

An exceedingly important part of the program of farm-mortgage relief is embraced in part 3 of the amendment, which authorizes direct loans by the Farm Loan Commissioner to farm borrowers on the security of junior mortgages. For this purpose $200,000,000 is to be allocated by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Farm Loan Commissioner. The maximum loan to any one farmer is $5,000; the interest is not to exceed 5 percent; the mortgage given as security plus all prior liens must not exceed 75 percent of the value of the property; and the loan may be repaid in 10 installments, beginning in the fourth year.

With the proceeds of such a loan a farmer may refinance his indebtedness, provide himself with working capital, or redeem or repurchase his farm home, if foreclosed within a year prior to the enactment of this act, or foreclosed thereafter.

AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENT DISTRICTS

The last of the principal divisions of the proposed amendment is designed to reduce the obligation of farmers indebted to drainage, levee, irrigation, and similar improvement districts. For that purpose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make $50,000,000 available to enable the agricultural improvement districts to acquire their own bonds at a discount, on condition that the benefit is transferred to the farmer. To prevent speculation, the amendment provides that no loan shall be made until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is satisfied that the bonds will be acquired at a reasonable price, taking into consideration the average market price during the 6 months ending March 1, 1933.

To me it seems clear, Mr. President, that the proposal submitted in the amendment will unquestionably reduce the burden of farm debt, relieve its pressure and irritation, especially where it has been causing the greatest distress, and permit the farmer to work out his difficult problem during the period of emergency without fear of eviction. I know quite well that some Members of this body believe Congress ought to be even more generous in its treatment of the farm debt. My answer is that we could not be more generous to agricultural debtors without transferring the burden to the shoulders of others equally unable to bear it, and without threatening the success of the entire enterprise by stretching the credit of the United States to the danger point.

Let us also remember, in formulating our judgment, that this proposal is not an isolated measure whose benefits and costs can be estimated separately. It must be appraised as part of a far-flung program involving domestic and foreign readjustments, calling for reorganization and revival not only in agriculture but in finance, commerce, and industry as well.

Mr. President, I believe I correctly estimate the sentiment of the Senate when I say that no plea is necessary for the adoption of the amendment. Every Member of this body is thoroughly alive to the distressing conditions the legislation is designed to alleviate. True enough, it goes beyond what we had theretofore regarded as the proper boundary of governmental action; but so also have the forces of deflation and depression gone beyond the bounds of experience or reason. Half-hearted measures will not prevail against them. If we are to win in the battle in which we have thus far beaten a retreat, we must be willing to employ measures powerful enough to make victory a practical certainty.

No doubt values must be readjusted to the new scales. In this proposal, however, we undertake to accomplish in an orderly, equitable, and humane manner what foreclosure has in the past effected with cruelty and unwarranted hardship.

The measure now before you represents the most far-reaching effort ever made in the United States to protect the farmer against foreclosure and to reduce the burden of debt under which he has been laboring throughout the period of price decline. I have every confidence that the amendment will be adopted.

Now, Mr. President, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, I should like just briefly to point out the differences between title 2 of the pending bill and the amendment which I have offered.

Title 2 of the pending bill omits the authority of the Farm Loan Commissioner to fix the denominations of the bonds to be issued under the bill. The amendment I propose gives him that authority.

In the provision which authorizes an appropriation of $50,000,000 for subscriptions to the Federal land banks, the agricultural bill contains the language "and such additional amounts as may thereafter be necessary." The Banking and Currency Committee regarded that as too comprehensive an authority, and too indefinite, and we limited the authorization to $50,000,000.

The agricultural bill omits the section of the banking and currency bill, which authorizes an increase in the maximum size of loans to farmers. The amendment raises the sum to $50,000, but before such a loan can be made it must be authorized by the Federal Farm Loan Commissioner.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bill proposed by the Banking and Currency Committee authorizes the $50,000 loan that has to be O.K.'d by the Farm Loan Commissioner?

Mr. WAGNER. It does.

In the part of the bill dealing with joint-stock land banks the agricultural bill omits all of section 203, which directs the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make $25,000,000 available for loans to finance delinquencies. I think we have $25,000,000 which may be borrowed so that the farmer may meet his taxes and other charges.

Mr. SMITH. Was that left out?

Mr. WAGNER. That is left out of the pending bill; yes. The agricultural bill still uses the phrase "normal value", although I had understood that the committee had stricken out the word "normal", whereas the amendment which I propose simply uses the word "value."

Mr. SMITH. We took out the word "normal."

Mr. WAGNER. The committee perhaps intended to take it out, but the bill still contains the word "normal." I understood that the committee had agreed that that word ought to be eliminated.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. The agricultural bill omits the section of the banking and currency bill which authorizes the Federal land banks and farm-loan associations to make their facilities available in making direct loans. We provide for the use of the facilities of the Federal land banks and the farm-loan associations in making direct loans to farmers.

In the part of the bill dealing with loans to improvement districts, the agricultural bill omits the provision about liquidation and about the contract of purchase. In other words, I think we have a more effective safeguard against the possibility of speculation in drainage-district bonds.

The agricultural bill does not contain the section of the banking and currency bill dealing with the Executive order relating to reorganization. That is really a formal amendment, to which I am sure the Senator will agree.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if any provision was made in the banking and currency bill looking toward the scaling down of mortgages held by the Federal land banks, as well as the scaling down of interest?

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, yes. In other words, the matter of the purchase of outstanding mortgages by the Federal land bank is a matter of negotiation; and undoubtedly the Federal Farm Loan Commissioner, unless he receives some benefits for the farmer in the way of scaling down the principal of the mortgage as well as an automatic reduction of interest, will not give his bonds or cash in exchange for the outstanding mortgage.

Mr. SMITH. The reason why I ask that question is that in the discussion of this matter before the Agricultural Committee the expert stated emphatically that there could be no scaling down of the mortgages held by the Federal land bank.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator means the mortgages now held by them?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the mortgages now held by them.

Mr. WAGNER. The outstanding bonds. No; we make provision simply that the interest rate for a period of 5 years is reduced to 4½ percent, which gives them an average of a full 1-percent reduction in interest.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but the point I am making is this——

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator's proposal is exactly like ours in that regard.

Mr. SMITH. This does not satisfy me. It did not satisfy me when it passed, though reasons were advanced why perhaps from the banking standpoint it should be as it is in the Senator's proposal and in the Agricultural Committee bill. But in liquidating the joint-stock land banks, and in dealing with the insurance companies and the private mortgagees, provision is made to scale down the mortgage as well as the interest, on the presumption that the present value of the land upon which the mortgage was issued has so far declined that unless the one who has mortgaged his land can get it scaled down in something like the proportion in which his land has declined in value, a mere reduction of interest avails him very little.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, I do not see how practically that can be done. The bonds are outstanding, and the mortgages are up as collateral for the bonds.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that. Then we are going to leave the man who has a Federal land-bank mortgage without the hope of having the original value of his mortgage reduced at all, when the object of this legislation is to reappraise, as far as we can have it done, the value of the land, scale down the mortgage in accordance with the reappraisal, and then reduce the interest.

We are doing that with the joint-stock banks; we are doing that with the insurance companies. We have made every provision to do that. But the man who is indebted to the Federal land bank can have no scaling down of his mortgage, it does not make any difference if the mortgage is notoriously in excess of the present value of the land as measured by the salability of the land and the return from it. The only help he can get is through a reduction in the interest.

Mr. WAGNER. He gets a reduction in the interest, and he gets a moratorium, or a deferment of the payment of the principal for a period of 5 years.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I was hoping that there might be some arrangement made by which the distressed individuals in the Federal land banks might get the same treatment accorded those holding bonds. What difference does it make? The joint-stock land bank man now is to get relief. The man indebted to the insurance company will get relief. But the only relief the Federal land-bank debtor will get is a scaling down of his interest and prolonging the day of his death for 4 or 5 years; that is all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there; there is a provision, the same in both bills, that in order to reduce and refinance farm mortgages which have been executed prior to the passage of this measure, the Farm Board is authorized to invest such money as it may have in its possession in the purchasing of outstanding mortgages, at a sum not in excess of the unpaid balance or at a sum equal to 50 percent of the value of the property, whatever may be the result. As I understand it, there is no way by which Congress can compel a scaling down of any mortgage debt.

Mr. SMITH. I know that.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is all voluntary; but it is expected that under that section they may be able to purchase outstanding mortgages in a way that will result in a scaling down of debts which are actually due under the law under which they operate.

Mr. SMITH. It was testified before the committee that whenever we begin to scale down mortgages within the jurisdiction of the Federal land bank, we jeopardize the market value of the bonds, and that could not be allowed.

Mr. WAGNER. Not only that, but the right of the bondholder must be considered. I am sure that if there were some way of scaling down the outstanding mortgages held by the Federal land bank, provision would have been made for it. I do not know how much we can scale down those mortgages, because, as the Senator knows, the Federal land-bank bonds are selling almost at par, even in a terribly distressed bond market. I do not think that we ought to overlook the fact that we are conferring some benefit, giving a reduction of interest from 5½, sometimes a little more, down to 4½, for a period of 5 years, and we are also giving a moratorium upon the payment of the principal, and, even in emergency cases, on the payment of interest, for the period of 5 years, which is a breathing space. Of course, the Senator knows that as to outstanding mortgages they may be purchased, either by bonds or money. There is the opportunity for scaling down, and undoubtedly none will be purchased unless there is a scaling down both in the principal and in interest. I do not think the Government ever went as far, in the way of refinancing or attempting to reduce an indebtedness, as we are going in this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, so far as law and morals are concerned, the Federal Government was just as much obligated to the joint-stock land bank as it was to the Federal land bank, because we made the bonds of both nontaxable, and I do not know but what the obligation extended more to the joint stock than it did to the Federal land bank. I recall the appropriation we made 2 or 3 years ago of $25,000,000 for the purpose of enabling delinquent borrowers to be tided over a certain period of delinquency, and then a hundred million dollars, in addition, to replenish the credit of the Federal land bank put them in a position where their bonds are selling around par. But that does not change the fact, that unless conditions improve 100 percent, those who are mortgaged to the Federal land bank will never pay them any more than they can pay the joint-stock land bank.

Mr. WAGNER. The mortgages are undoubtedly choice mortgages, or the bonds would not be selling at par.

Mr. SMITH. I beg the Senator's pardon. That does not follow, for the reason that the $100,000,000 which we granted as a basis of credit, plus the $25,000,000, to take care of delinquencies, is what kept those bonds at as near par as they are, while the joint-stock land bank was not extended that accommodation, and the result was that when the depression came, their bonds went down until they were almost worthless.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, the Senator understands that under this legislation there is provision for direct loans to help farmers.

Mr. SMITH. The Government practically guaranteed the bonds by saying that they were nontaxable.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was necessary to put the provision regarding the Government in the law, in order to make the bonds nontaxable. It was never intended to carry even the implication that the Government was behind the bonds, but in order to make them tax-exempt, and thereby reflect a lower rate of interest to the borrower, who was the farmer, it was necessary to write on the face of the bonds that they were instrumentalities of the United States Government.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; and to the ordinary farmer, who does not know all the technicalities and wonderful workings of Congress, he took it for granted that that bank was as much a part of the Government business as the Federal land bank, and they went into it with the same belief as they went into the other. But I do not care to discuss that phase of it now. The thing in which I am interested is the possibility of scaling down the mortgages of the farmer regardless of the party to whom he owes the mortgage debt.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator undoubtedly observed that in the bill provision is made for an appropriation of $15,000,000 for the first year, which is unrepayable, which is really given to aid the farmers, and properly so. I have no hesitancy in voting for it. But that is in the nature of a subsidy, to make up the difference between the 4½ percent and the 5 percent.

Mr. SMITH. That is where we are scaling down the interest.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; that is where we are scaling down the interest, and I make no apologies for that. I am very glad to vote for it.

Mr. SMITH. I presume the same provision is in one bill that is in the other, that the junior mortgage, such as the chattel mortgage, mortgages on instrumentalities which the farmer necessarily must have to carry on a farm, are taken care of.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; and besides, if the farmer has been foreclosed within the last year, he may have up to $5,000 in order to redeem the foreclosed home.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is a provision on page 4 of this amendment which has relationship, I think, to the subject matter under discussion. It is the reference to any farm mortgage purchased by the Federal land bank. It may purchase any first mortgage, and when it does so, it purchases it at the best price it can obtain, and then reflects to the borrower whatever reduction may have been obtained in the mortgage.

Mr. WAGNER. That is not what the Senator from South Carolina was discussing. He was discussing the possibility of scaling down the outstanding mortgages now held by the Federal land bank. The Senator from Arkansas is talking now about purchasers from other sources of mortgages outstanding with insurance companies, or joint-stock land banks, or individual owners. Those mortgages may be purchased or exchanged for bonds, and that is where the opportunity exists for negotiations so as to scale down not only the interest but the principal.

Mr. SMITH. That is right.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator from Arkansas has some amendments which are in the nature of perfecting amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have what may be termed "perfecting amendments." They have been examined by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Oregon, and I should like now to have those amendments considered and disposed of.

The first amendment is on page 3, line 10. A brief explanation will be made when the amendment has been read. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair make this suggestion: Title 2 of the pending bill is an amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and, being inserted matter, it must become an amendment in the first degree.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that course is not desired by the Senator in charge of the bill. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York was considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and it is similar to the amendment in the bill, with the exception of the differences which were explained at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by the Senator from New York.

The course those in charge of the bill desire to pursue is to perfect the amendment of the Senator from New York, and I ask the privilege of doing that at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that title II of the bill be regarded as original text so far as amendments are concerned, so that the substitute offered thereto and title II will be subject to amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there was a little confusion, and I did not get distinctly the statement of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from New York is offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute for that title in the bill which deals with the refinancing of farm mortgages. The amendment which he has offered was considered at some length by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and certain amendments were proposed by that committee which are acceptable to the Senator in charge of the bill. Then there are certain additional amendments, in the nature of perfecting amendments, which I propose now to offer to the amendment of the Senator from New York. I ask consideration of the first amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Arkansas is agreed to.

The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] proposes the following amendment: On page 3, line 10, after the word "refinancing" and the period, to insert the following:

Any borrower who obtains a loan from a Federal land bank after the date this paragraph takes effect may, at any time after the expiration of 5 years from the date such loan was made, tender to such bank on any regular installment date bonds issued under this paragraph in an amount not to exceed the unpaid principal of his loan, and the bonds so tendered shall be accepted by the bank at par in payment of any part of such unpaid principal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment is almost self-explanatory. It would require the Federal land banks to accept bonds issued under the provisions of section 21 of the Wagner amendment at par in payment of the principal of any loan made after the bill takes effect. It is in the nature of a substitute for an amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. It does not require the banks to accept the bonds in payment of the obligation until after the end of 5 years. The reason for that, of course, is apparent. It would be unfair to the banks to compel them to accept immature obligations, but, under existing law, the banks are now at liberty to accept bonds after 5 years in payment, but they cannot be required to do so. This amendment would require them to accept such bonds in satisfaction of obligations. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am asking the question for information. Assume that prior to the 5 years the bonds shall have so depreciated as that they might be bought upon the market, say, for 30 or 40 cents on the dollar, would this amendment contemplate that the persons who purchase them might obtain par at the end of 5 years?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It does require the banks to accept their own obligations, bonds issued under the terms of this agreement, for an equivalent amount due the banks after 5 years. Any borrower who obtains a loan from a Federal land bank at the date this paragraph takes effect may, at any time after the expiration of 5 years from the date such loan was made, tender to such bank on any regular installment date bonds issued under this paragraph in an amount not to exceed the unpaid principal of his loan, and the bonds so tendered shall be accepted by the bank at par in payment of any part of such unpaid principal. This amendment, if adopted, will be of real benefit to the borrowers and will help support the market for the new bonds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with the explanation made by the Senator from Arkansas, I am in entire accord with the proposition. The only point I had in mind was this: Assume that some person or persons should go out and speculate in bonds, buying a large number of them, would they be permitted to do so when they are not borrowers?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the language is perfectly plain. It is only the borrower who will have that privilege.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I inquire, Does it apply to new bonds or bonds that have been previously issued?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It applies only to new bonds.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a further question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. STEIWER. I merely want to inquire whether the Farm Loan Board has been advised concerning this amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Representatives of the Farm Loan Board prepared this amendment. The amendment came from the administrative department.

Mr. STEIWER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I send to the desk a second amendment, which I desire may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, it is proposed to strike out lines 9 to 13, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 32. The Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to make such rules and regulations and to appoint, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title and to make the relief contemplated by this title immediately available, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, there is a limitation in title I with regard to employees who may be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture. This amendment seems to modify that general policy, giving to the Secretary in the administration of title II a freedom not granted under title I.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, title I relates to the administration of the provisions in the bill which are known as the "fair exchange value plan", the "cost-of-production plan", and so forth. This has relation to the refinancing of farm mortgages. It does not incorporate any specific limitation on the maximum amount that may be paid by the Farm Loan Commissioner. If the Senator from Oregon wishes to incorporate a provision on that subject, I shall have no objection to it, but I make this statement: The Secretary of Agriculture feels that the limitation imposed by the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], making $8,500 the maximum amount which he may pay to an expert officer or agent in the administration of title I, is calculated to handicap him, in that he expects to need a few officers and employees of a higher standard than perhaps will be available under such a limitation.

He also insists that the Economy Act provision applies to the salaries of $8,500, which was made the limit by the amendment incorporated in the bill yesterday. I made the statement on the floor yesterday that unless there is some language in the Economy Act which makes it apply to future legislation—that is, to legislation creating new positions and fixing new salaries—it would not apply; but the Secretary of Agriculture had his attorney investigate that subject, and he is of the opinion that the $8,500 limitation would be subject to a possible 15 percent reduction. There is no limitation in this amendment on the maximum amount.

Mr. MCNARY. That is the point, and it is quite contrary to the declared policy expressed in title II. Not only does it leave free the Commissioner, but the salaries of all agents and employees can be fixed without regard to the limitation imposed under other titles of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator wishes to propose an amendment to this amendment fixing the same limitation as has been included with respect to title I, I shall not object to it.

Mr. McNARY. I should prefer that the whole bill be on an even plane with regard to the appointment of employees and the fixing of their compensation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator will propose an amendment, I will be glad to have it considered.

Mr. McNARY. I think we can work it out. I do not want to disturb the Senator in offering other amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will suggest the language as I should like to get along with it, because there are other amendments coming on that may require more attention than do the amendments I am offering.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. At the end of the amendment I will add a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That no salary or compensation in excess of $8,500 shall be paid to any person employed under the terms of the foregoing section.

Mr. McNARY. That proviso is satisfactory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; I will modify my amendment and offer it with that proviso incorporated in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as modified, to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Now, Mr. President, a third amendment includes a large number of comparatively immaterial changes in the language of the bill. Some of these amendments merely relate to typographical matter and others are of substantial significance. They are all intended to be perfecting amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments now proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out "the issuing bank or banks shall" and insert "it shall appear to the Farm Loan Commissioner that the issuing bank or banks will."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 18, after the word "shall", it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "upon the request of the Commissioner."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, lines 14 and 15, to strike out "to read as follows" and insert in lieu thereof "by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "second."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On the same page, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "qualified."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 3, after the word "associations", it is proposed to insert "or through agents as provided in section 15, or purchased from joint-stock land banks."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 5, after the word "made", it is proposed to insert "through national farm-loan associations."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, at the end of line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

The foregoing provisions shall apply to loans made by Federal land banks through branches, except that the rate of interest on such loans for such 5-year period shall be 5 percent in lieu of 4½ percent.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 19, in the subhead, it is proposed to strike out "Reconstruction Finance Corporation" and to insert in lieu thereof "The Farm Loan Commissioners."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the numerals "202" and insert the numerals "29."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 25, and on page 14, line 1, it is proposed to strike out "empowered to make" and insert in lieu thereof "directed to make available to the Farm Loan Commissioner, out of the funds of the Corporation, the sum of $25,000,000, to be used by him for the purpose of making."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, line 21, commencing with the words "The aggregate", it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including "$25,000,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, it is proposed to strike out the word "Corporation" wherever it appears and in lieu thereof to insert "Farm Loan Commissioner."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The only effect of that amendment, I may say, is to change the authority from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Farm Loan Commissioners.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 19, line 12, after the word "State", to insert a comma.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 21, line 21, to strike out the word "with" and insert the word "which."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 21, line 24, after the word "time", to insert a comma.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 21, line 25, to strike out "$300,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$325,000,000."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is the additional $25,000,000 to take care of the items found on page 14?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; embraced in section 30 (a). This is necessary to make it conform with the amendment already agreed to.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I submit another amendment, which I send to the desk. This is to be made a new section following section 37.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Following section 37 in the proposed substitute of the Senator from New York it is proposed to insert the following new section:

PERFECTING ORGANIZATION OF FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

SEC. —. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized, in carrying out the powers and duties now or hereafter vested in him or the Farm Credit Administration by law or under any Executive order made under title IV of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act of 1933, as amended, to establish, and to fix the powers and duties of, such divisions, agencies, corporations, and instrumentalities as he may deem necessary to the efficient functioning of the Farm Credit Administration and the successful execution of the powers and duties so vested in the Governor and the Farm Credit Administration. This section shall not be construed to restrict the authority of the President under title IV of such act, as amended.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas make an explanation of the proposed amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This is similar to the section that was adopted with reference to the Farm Loan Commissioner. It merely gives the new manager of the Credit Administration, the Governor, or whatever his proper title may be, all necessary power to employ agents and officers and to set up the organization necessary to carry out the provisions in relation to refinancing. The other section which I presented and which was agreed to had relation to title I. This is to be administered not by the Farm Loan Commissioner but by the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration. I say certain provisions are to be executed by the Farm Loan Commissioner, but the administration generally is under the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration.

I think it fair to say that there is no limitation in this provision on the maximum amount that may be paid by the head of the bureau in carrying out the authority vested in him. If the Senator from Oregon suggests or insists, I will consent to the same proviso that was added to the other.

Mr. McNARY. I think, to carry out the uniform practice, it should have such a proviso.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In any event, I do think it fair that the matter should go to conference. Therefore I offer the following modification in the form of a proviso:

Provided, That no salary or compensation shall be paid to any officer, agent, or other person employed under this section in excess of $8,500 per annum.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I want to inquire to ascertain whether I have caught the full force and effect of the proposal. Am I right in assuming that the purpose of the amendment to the amendment is to confer such authority upon the official who is created by the Executive order of March 27, the order which consolidated certain agricultural credit agencies?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. STEIWER. Am I right in my understanding of the amendment as offered that it is in the nature of an amendment to the so-called "economy rider" which was attached to the Post Office and Treasury Departments appropriation bill in the last Congress?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think it touches that act in the legal sense. In the sense that it gives permission to employ new agents and new officers, it has a relationship, and the Senator is right about that, but it is necessary to do this in order to make it possible that the act shall be administered.

Mr. STEIWER. I had not conceived that it would be necessary; but if it is so regarded, of course there is no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is. It was presented to me by the administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I now offer an amendment that has relation to a matter of some special importance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, between lines 11 and 12, insert the following:

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN BONDS AS SECURITY FOR ADVANCES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

SEC. 27a. The seventh paragraph of section 13 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "or by the deposit or pledge of bonds issued pursuant to the paragraph added to section 32 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, by section 21 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment may be explained in very brief terms. This makes the bonds issued as herein authorized eligible as collateral for 15-day loans. It is estimated that the result of incorporating this provision will make a difference of at least one half of 1 percent in the interest rate. It is applied only to new bonds.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas knows that one of the most dangerous provisions in the Federal Reserve Act is the 15-day provision. It is that provision that enabled the stock gamblers in New York in 10 banks alone to use approximately $9,000,000,000 of Federal Reserve securities for stock-gambling purposes by the use of United States bonds alone.

We have amended the law at the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] so as to furnish more fuel for the flames of stock gambling by admitting such securities of the intermediate banks as under the law are purchasable in the bond market by the Federal Reserve banks. But the whole section ought to be repealed. It is one of the most dangerous and decidedly the most maladministered section of the Federal Reserve Act. It was put in there during the war as a war measure under the implied agreement that after the war was over it would be taken out. It was put in there to prevent the embarrassment of the larger banks overnight, so that they might temporarily supply unexpected deficiencies in their resources. It seems to me that now to add further fuel to the fire of speculation is a very grave mistake. That is all I have to say about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from New York. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let us have a division; but before taking the vote I ask that the clerk may report my amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I recognize the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] as an authority on subjects pertaining to banking. I do not conceive, however, that this amendment has any direct relationship to speculative loans. Without doubt there will be an effort in the early future to legislate on the subject of speculative loans by commercial banks. I shall be strongly inclined to follow the lead of the able Senator from Virginia.

The object of the pending amendment is to give the farmers the benefit of a reduced rate of interest by making the bonds issued under the authority of this act, the new bonds to be exchanged for first mortgages, eligible for the 15-day loans referred to. While the 15-day loan provision is in the law I do not believe there is any reason why its benefits should not be reflected in the way the amendment contemplates. It means a great deal.

If the statement of those who suggest the amendment is correct, it means a reduction of one half of 1 percent in the rate of interest which the bonds shall bear. It is of considerable value and importance to those who finally will have to pay the bonds; and I think the Senate ought to incorporate the amendment in the bill, and at least give the conferees an opportunity of considering the subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what these bonds are? I cannot keep in mind exactly section 32 of the Federal Farm Loan Act or section 21 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act. What are these bonds that are issued, and which it is proposed to pledge here? What bonds are they? They are not Government bonds. They are not Federal land-bank bonds. I do not see just what they are.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes; they are Federal land-bank bonds on which the Government has guaranteed the interest, or will guarantee the interest.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, of course, I do not undertake to impeach the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas. I think it is altogether worthy. I think his intention is to improve the market value of these bonds. But even United States bonds ought not to be used as they have been used for this purpose; and there is a vast deal of difference between United States bonds, for which the Government is 100 percent responsible, and these farm-loan bonds, for which the Government is not at all responsible, except for the payment of interest.

For 15-day loans, however, any security used is merely speculative. The loans themselves are merely speculative. People do not make loans from banks merely for 15 days unless there is an emergency, or unless they want the money for speculative purposes; and, as I have repeatedly pointed out here in the Senate Chamber, the New York banks and brokers used that particular provision of the Federal Reserve Act in the most shameless way conceivable, and used millions of dollars—10 banks alone using nearly $900,000,000 over a period of 4 months—for speculative purposes alone. This is simply affording them additional material to carry on that speculation.

I will say to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Senate that those of us who, for two years and a half, have been working industriously over a bank bill had a provision in that bill as it passed the Senate before by a vote of 54 to 9, that imposed an excess rate of interest to begin with, as well as a severe penalty upon the misuse of that provision of the bill.

The Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time, will recall that we put it in the bill as a war measure, under the implied agreement that as soon as the war was over we would strike it out. We merely put it in there to avert serious embarrassment over a few days to banks that were carrying on extensive business in order that they might recover their financial equilibrium.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Under the law today the Federal Reserve banks are not authorized to purchase any bonds of this type, are they?

Mr. GLASS. They are authorized to purchase them in the open market, but they are not eligible for rediscount. They have not purchased any, however.

Mr. WAGNER. I understood that they were restricted in their purchases to bonds of this character having a maturity of 6 months or less.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. That is what I mean. A bond of this character cannot be purchased, even in the open market, by the Federal Reserve banks, unless it has a maturity of 6 months or less.

Mr. GLASS. That is right.

Mr. WAGNER. So that none of these bonds to be issued could be purchased for a period of at least 19½ years if they are 20-year bonds.

The other question I want to ask is whether or not now there are any long-term private obligations which may be deposited as collateral for a 15-day loan? I understand that there are not.

Mr. GLASS. No. The eligibility was confined to United States bonds; and at the time it was confined to United States bonds there were less than $100,000,000 of them available for purchase. It was purely a war measure.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. Under exigent circumstances, may not other classes of securities be offered to the Reserve banks as a basis for the 15-day loans?

Mr. GLASS. Not for the 15-day loans. We passed the Glass-Steagall bill, under which, in exigent circumstances, the "cats and dogs" of any bank may be offered for loans; but, thank God, very few of them have been taken.

Mr. STEIWER. I think the Senator is quite right that there has not been any considerable abuse of the extraordinary provisions contained in the bill; but it is my recollection that under exigent circumstances, and with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board——

Mr. GLASS. Five members of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. STEIWER. That securities far less in dignity than the Federal land-bank bonds may be offered under existing law.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes. As the bill came up originally, these abominable worthless foreign securities might be offered; but we struck that out and safeguarded it somewhat.

Mr. WAGNER. That is not only for the period of 1 year.

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, no; that has been extended.

Mr. GLASS. It has been extended to 1 year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is right.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am the last person in the world who would want to do anything to prevent the marketing with the utmost facility of farm-loan bonds, but I do want to warn the Senator against tinkering with the Federal Reserve Act. We are going to find ourselves in almost inextricable difficulties if we do not stop it.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption? Or possibly I should address myself to the Senator from Arkansas.

In view of the emergency legislation that permits advances to be made, in exigent circumstances, upon securities that formerly were not within the limits of eligibility, is the Senator's amendment necessary? In other words, will not the existing emergency legislation permit this class of bonds to be offered as security for the 15-day advances?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; for the reason that the statute defines the classes of security that may be used as collateral for the 15-day loans. It is the seventh paragraph of section 13. It reads as follows:

> Any Federal Reserve bank may make advances to its member banks on their promissory notes for a period not exceeding 15 days at rates to be established by such Federal Reserve banks, subject to the review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, provided such promissory notes are secured by such notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or bankers' acceptances as are eligible for rediscount or for purchase by Federal Reserve banks under the provisions of this act or by the deposit or pledge of bonds or notes of the United States.

My point is this: I am in hearty sympathy with the proposal of the Senator from Virginia to prevent commercial banks from making speculative loans; but so long as those loans are authorized, so long as certain collateral may be used for 15-day loans, and collateral of less dignity—as the Senator from Oregon has said—than these land-bank bonds, I think we might just as well reflect the benefit of a reduced interest rate to the farmer by making them eligible as collateral for the 15-day loans.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as I was reminded a while ago by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], who was my predecessor as Secretary of the Treasury, the 15-day loans are not made on this other collateral. They are made only on United States bonds; and the almost moral crime that has been perpetrated by the maladministration of the Federal Reserve Act has been that they have literally submerged the very primary purpose of the act—which was to be responsive to the requirements of commerce and industry and agriculture—they have almost submerged the rediscount provision of the act in these open-market speculations in United States securities and in foreign securities. It has been little less than a crime to have maladministered the law in that way; and the more fuel we add to the flame, the more difficult it is going to be ever to remedy the situation.

I hope the Senator from Arkansas will see that as we see it who have followed the thing a little more intimately than he has. There is a vast deal of difference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield; yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am wondering if the Senator will not consent that the amendment shall go to conference. In case the amendment should be incorporated in the bill, if after further consideration of the matter it be found not advisable to adhere to it, I shall not insist upon the matter. I should like, however, to have the conferees have an opportunity of considering this proposal.

Mr. GLASS. Well, I have been so much disposed to yield to the Senator from Arkansas that I sometimes begin to think I have not any mind of my own left. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me? No Senator who knows the Senator from Virginia would ever indulge in such a fallacious thought as that.

Mr. GLASS. No; the Senator from Virginia knows that while the Senator from Arkansas usually is as sound as a dollar—that is, the present dollar, not the proposed depreciated dollar—sometimes I have followed him in matters that were contrary to my judgment. I do not want to be obstinate about the thing. I am simply appealing to the Senator to let that go by. It is a contribution to the most dangerous clause of the Federal Reserve Act, and that clause of the Federal Reserve Act the maladministration of which has contributed more to the present depression than anything with which we have had to do in Congress.

That is all. I do not want to be obstinate. People think I am obstinate and dictatorial, but I am not. I am the most amiable member of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, nobody doubts that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to perfect the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Kentucky offers the following amendment: On page 11, line 1, after the word "amended", to insert the following words: "or any receiver appointed by a district court of the United States."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the object of the amendment is very simple. Section 27 of the pending amendment provides that any receiver appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board, pursuant to section 29 of the Farm Loan Act, may borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to pay taxes upon property on which it has a mortgage.

There are now pending lawsuits in some of the Federal courts attacking the power of the Federal Farm Loan Board to appoint receivers under section 29. Nobody knows what the decision will be, but if they should uphold that contention, they would take away from the Farm Board the power to appoint receivers, and that power would lie in the courts of the United States.

This amendment simply authorizes any receiver appointed by a United States district court to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to protect the property upon which he has mortgages by paying taxes or for such other purposes as are stated in section 27.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes the following amendment: To insert, after the word "applicant", on page 21, line 16, the following:

That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized and empowered to advance from funds made available by section 2 of the act of January 22, 1932 (47 Stat.L. 5), to the reclamation fund created by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat.L. 388), such sum or sums as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary, not exceeding $5,000,000, for the completion of projects or divisions of projects now under construction, or projects approved and authorized. Funds so advanced shall be repaid out of any receipts and accretions accruing to the reclamation fund within such time as may be fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, not exceeding 5 years from the date of advance, with interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum. Sums so advanced may be expended in the same way as other moneys in the reclamation fund.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Oregon to this amendment. I know he is familiar with it. Recently I offered a bill which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and was unanimously reported by that committee. This amendment which I have offered is, with proper changes in the phraseology, merely the bill which was aproved by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. We have provided in the pending amendment for the use of a very large sum of money, to be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for refinancing drainage and reclamation and other improvement districts, whether carried on under the laws of the United States or of the States. Does the Senator's amendment provide for an additional $5,000,000, to be advanced or used in the construction or completion of projects already under way?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not entirely familiar with the provision to which the Senator refers. My amendment is independent of any other provision in the bill. The reason, briefly stated, for my bill is as follows:

The Senator recalls that a short time ago a moratorium was granted to the settlers upon reclamation projects who were delinquent in their payments to the reclamation fund. That moratorium prevented the replenishment of the reclamation fund, and prevented the reclamation bureau going forward with contracts which it had made, and in the execution of projects which were in process of completion. There are hundreds of men now employed upon these irrigation and reclamation projects, which are the children, if I may use that expression, of the Federal Government. If work upon those projects should now cease, it would result in great damage to them, to the people, and to the Government. To prevent that catastrophe this limited sum is requested. It will be repaid, of course, from the reclamation fund, as soon as it is replenished from the payments which will be made by settlers upon the reclamation projects.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under section 35 the bill authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend an aggregate sum of as much as $50,000,000 to drainage districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and other similar land-improvement projects. While it is in the bill, and probably will remain in the bill, it has always been questionable in my mind whether the Federal Government ought to underwrite or take over these drainage or irrigation or improvement districts which have been created under the laws of either the States or of the United States. But the provision is here. This amendment the Senator proposes adds another $5,000,000 for the very same purpose for which this section 35 was intended to be included.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Probably the Senator has made this observation, but the proposal suggested by the Senator from Kentucky does not meet the situation now offered by the Senator from Utah. The $50,000,000 mentioned in the amendment, which may be borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is to refinance completed organizations, whether drainage or irrigation. The proposal of the Senator from Utah is to advance $5,000,000 from the reclamation fund to complete uncompleted projects, to carry them to completion, which cannot be done under the language of the amendment.

There are several projects through the country for which the Federal Government has appropriated very large sums, which are now incomplete. The Senator from Utah simply wants to get sufficient money to complete those projects, so that after they are completed, they can come within the terms of the law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have said all I care to on the amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment reported again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes the following amendment: To insert after the word "applicant" on page 21, line 16, the following:

That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized and empowered to advance from funds made available by section 2 of the act of January 22, 1932 (47 Stat.L. 5), to the reclamation fund created by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat.L. 388), such sum or sums as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary, not exceeding $5,000,000, for the completion of projects or divisions of projects now under construction, or projects approved and authorized. Funds so advanced shall be repaid out of any receipts and accretions accruing to the reclamation fund within such time as may be fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, not exceeding 5 years from the date of advance, with interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum. Sums so advanced may be expended in the same way as other moneys in the reclamation fund.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, it would only include unfinished projects which have heretofore been begun by the Government, and it would not allow any loans to districts which were uncompleted, of a State or of a county character. Is that correct?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the amendment does not relate to districts or to private projects or enterprises. It is limited to reclamation projects inaugurated by the Government and which are in course of construction or are authorized by the Government of the United States, the payment for which was to come from the reclamation fund.

The Senator may recall that a short time ago, because of the impoverished condition of the farmers, those who are upon the reclamation projects as well as others, Congress passed a measure granting a moratorium to settlers upon reclamation projects, so that the amounts they were to have paid into the reclamation fund for 2 years were pretermitted. If it had not been for that moratorium, many settlers would have been compelled to leave the projects, or to have parted with all their possessions in order to raise the money to meet the obligations then due. The Government felt that, under the circumstances, a moratorium ought to be granted.

In view of the granting of the moratorium, those payments which would have been made the reclamation fund and from which drafts would have been made to continue construction work, were not available, as a result of which the practically exhausted funds authorizes the lending to these reclamation projects, projects of the Government, of $5,000,000, which is to be repaid by the settlers upon the projects within a limited period of time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have no objection to those projects being included, but if we include those projects we certainly would work a discrimination against a great many private undertakings or projects of a drainage or reclamation character which are being carried on by the counties or by certain drainage districts.

I have read the paragraph of the bill on this subject, and it seems to apply exclusively to completed projects, but it is not restricted to governmental projects, as related by the Senator from Utah. As an illustration, in some States parts of two counties form a drainage district, and they have reached within 90 percent of completion of some particular project. Such a district would not be eligible to obtain a loan under the provisions of the bill. I think it very wise to authorize the inclusion of a situation of the kind related by the Senator from Utah, but we should also have included districts of a local character, the same as those to which he refers.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I suggest that by reading section 35 the Senator from Florida will find all of the matters contained in the objection or suggestion he has made are covered. In other words, drainage districts organized, incomplete or completed, are provided for in section 35 with a $50,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Florida that I do not think that the reclamation projects, which are governmental projects, should be classed with enterprises of a private character. The matter which the Senator suggests may be dealt with in some other part of the bill, or as a separate amendment, but the amendment which I have offered deals solely and exclusively with what might be denominated governmental projects, governmental property, and if this appropriation is not made the Government may sustain damages to the extent of millions of dollars, because dams are in the course of construction under contracts for the violation of which the Government would be subjected to damages. Moreover, the suspension of work would greatly injure the incompleted structures, dams, canals, and so forth, and, of course, seriously injure settlers who have in good faith entered upon these projects.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what has happened to the reclamation fund? Why is that fund not able to take care of the matter?

Mr. KING. The reclamation fund would have been able to take care of it except for the fact that the farmers upon many of these projects, because of the distress of agriculture, were unable to meet their payments, and Congress granted a moratorium for 2 years, so that instead of replenishing the fund as it should have been had it not been for this calamitous condition of agriculture, it is practically exhausted, and, with the exhaustion of the fund, work upon these projects cannot go forward. This would result in great damage of the Federal Government and cause great distress to hundreds of families.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the comment of the Senator from Florida, I think, is not pertinent to the amendment of the Senator from Utah. I wish to point out that in the bill as it is now before the Senate the word used is "undertaken" and not "completed". Therefore, if the Senator from Florida will substitute in the amendment offered by the Senator from New York the word which is in the bill rather than the word in the amendment, it will refer to the projects which have been undertaken rather than projects which have been completed. That will be found in section 32 of the bill as it originally came in and not section 35 of the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator. I have in my hand the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from New York and which is now being considered, and in that print the word "completed" is used. It says "completed" instead of "undertaken." If it says "undertaken", of course that cures the situation I had in mind.

Mr. WAGNER. Unfortunately, I was out of the Chamber at the time the Senator made his suggestion. What does the Senator desire to accomplish?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The suggestion I have made arose on account of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, and it is that in regard to loans to drainage districts provision should be made that loans shall be made to districts which have undertaken projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of land for agricultural purposes.

Mr. SMITH. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the fact that in the agricultural bill or in an amendment to the agricultural bill proposed by the committee those very words were used.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that language covers it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think that is the language contained in the original Senate bill no. 1110, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. This section was written and rewritten and studied probably as carefully as any section of the bill as reported and is contained in the amendment of the Senator from New York. It has no relation whatever to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, and if there is going to be any effort made to change that language, it ought not to be confused with this amendment at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thoroughly understand the fact that it has no connection other than as argumentative and as a relief matter, because the Senator raised the question that they had no appropriation for uncompleted projects in his State; and I raised the question in the amendment we have before us that we have no appropriations for loans for any uncompleted projects anywhere else; and if one is corrected, both should be corrected.

Mr. WAGNER. The purposes are different, if I may say so to the Senator. The object of this proposal is to reduce the indebtedness of the farmer. These bonds are outstanding; they are a first lien upon the farmers; and thus, so long as those liens exist, the farmer is unable to borrow any money from the Federal land banks because of prior liens. The object of this is simply to reduce the indebtedness as much as possible by refinancing the bonds—that is, by buying in the bonds. It has nothing to do with any appropriation to finish any project, and it deals with an entirely different subject matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to my friend from Florida that I think he is in error in trying to unite these Federal projects with State projects. He referred to State and county projects. There are some projects which the Government itself has instituted and upon which it is engaged. It has spent considerable money in building dams on land which the Government owns for its reclamation and development and in bringing people upon the land. Now, the Government has millions and millions of dollars' worth of property in these projects. They are not private projects; they are governmental projects; and the Government is vitally interested in the completion of these projects, because, as I have indicated, the dams which are in process of construction upon some of the projects would deteriorate if the men were withdrawn and work were discontinued. So we are merely asking money from the Reconstruction Corporation to continue projects in which the Government itself is interested.

I have no objection to the Senator, when it comes to the $50,000,000 item, offering such an amendment as he pleases, but I do think he ought not to confound the amendment which I have offered with the other proposition to which he has referred and try to unite Federal Government projects with State and county projects.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am not attempting to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah. Of course, I realize that there is a distinction. If we go back to the history of the policy in inaugurating the program of reclamation at the general expense of the Government, of course, it brings up a different situation, but that is not relevant at the present time. I think it is relevant, however, that if the Government is going to finance completed projects, it should also authorize loans to help take care of the situation where the farmers have entered into a drainage or reclamation project and have lost their entire investment and the entire use of their land if probably a small amount of money is not expended for the purpose of completing the project. I do feel that they ought to be included.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for a moment in order briefly to make a further explanation in behalf of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah. I sincerely hope the Senate will agree to it. The Senator from Utah did not explain that he offered this amendment in the last Congress. His colleague also—I am referring now to former Senator Smoot—offered a like amendment. It happened that one of those amendments was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and the other to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. The proposals were considered by those committees in the last Congress and both were reported favorably to the Senate; both reports found their way on the calendar and some little effort was made to secure the enactment of one of them, but without success.

There is a very grave reason now why the Senate should regard this proposal favorably and include this amendment in the bill. It is not for the accommodation of the settlers alone that this proposal should be considered favorably here. The United States itself has a very direct interest in the matter. Senators will remember that in the last Congress, in the usual and normal consideration of appropriation bills, appropriations were made after full inquiry by all concerned and with the acquiescence and approval of the Committees on Appropriations in both House and Senate and with the approval of the Department and the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, and necessary appropriations were made to carry forward the going projects which are now under construction. Those appropriations, however, were made from a special fund, and I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that when that special fund is dried up it is like dipping a bucket into a well that has become dry; the appropriations remain but the money is not available. So we are confronted with this kind of a situation, that on a number of projects the Reclamation Bureau of the United States Government, in the best faith in the world, has made contracts for the completion of the works, but it finds itself now unable to meet its obligations under the contracts. The result of that, as the Senator from Utah has already suggested, is that our Government may be confronted with valid claims in the Court of Claims, claims that it will be obliged to pay; and all without benefit to the Government. Of course, the Government contracts ought not to be repudiated; they ought to be carried out; the contractors ought to receive the money for their work; their laborers ought not to be thrown out of employment. These works are out in the desert and semi-arid sections where there are no relief agencies, where there is little opportunity of caring for people out of employment; and unless the Government enables its Reclamation Bureau to go forward with the works which have already been contracted for, great harm will come to the Government, to the contractors, to the laborers, and to the settlers who have gone upon the land in reliance upon the United States Government's keeping faith with them.

I said in the Senate upon a former occasion, and I repeat it now, that here is one kind of loan made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that will be repaid. This has no relation, of course, to private agencies or private irrigation districts. It is simply transferring the money from one Federal agency to another under terms and conditions and circumstances which will guarantee the return of the money to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This is not the most important feature of the bill, because it applies only to a limited number of States and a limited number of localities; but so far as it goes it seems to me that it is one of the most important features in the bill and that we ought not to withhold our approval of it at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, Is it not true that this loan is secured by property to which the Government has the primary title?

Mr. STEIWER. In one sense, it is secured, Mr. President, and in a higher and greater sense it is even more than secured, because the Reclamation Bureau has certain revenues, even in the days of depression and moratoria, revenues such as oil royalties and revenues from other sources; and without question the Reclamation Bureau will be able to pay back to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation every cent of its obligations with interest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk and offer an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which the clerk will read.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, before the clerk reads it, may I say that it deals with the Philippines? We have put a provision in this bill which will defeat the purposes in some respects of the Philippine independence bill. So I hope Senators will listen to the amendment in order that we may correct that mistake.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 21, line 10, after the word "importation" it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That all taxes collected under this subsection upon articles coming from the possessions of the United States to which this title does not apply shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States but shall be held as a separate fund and paid into the Treasury of the said possessions, respectively, to be used and expended by the governments thereof for the benefit of agriculture.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, just a brief word of explanation. It will be recalled that at the last session of Congress we passed a bill granting, under certain conditions, independence to the Philippine people. In that bill we restricted the amount of sugar which they could send into the United States. We also provided for a scheme of tariffs which would be progressive in nature, and the money collected on Philippine importations would revert to the Philippine treasury. Under this plan it is proposed that those same importations be taxed and that the money shall go into our Treasury instead of into the Philippine treasury. I do not think that was the intention of those who offered the sugar amendment, and in order to make it doubly sure that the revenues collected on Philippine importations to the United States shall revert to the Philippine treasury and not be covered into our own Treasury this amendment is offered. It does not destroy what has been incorporated already in the bill; it simply clarifies it and prevents confusion and the diversion of money from the Philippine treasury into our own Treasury.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall be delighted to answer the Senator, if I can.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Maryland that under his amendment a tax on imported Philippine sugar, corresponding to the tax on our domestic sugar, will be paid?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should not like to answer that positively, but I am afraid that a brief reading of the amendment leads me to that conclusion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state to the Senator from Maryland that his is an amendment to title I. Amendments to title II are now under consideration and it will be necessary to have unanimous consent to consider his amendment at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall wait until after the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is disposed of, but as long as we have started discussion of my amendment I should like to clear it up.

The Senator from Colorado will recall that under our general tariff scheme products coming from the Philippine Islands are virtually considered as part of the products of the United States. That being the case I am afraid that there might be some contention here that the processing tax on Filipino products is levied by this bill. If that is the case then the amendment which I have offered should be incorporated in the bill. If I am wrong in my assumption, the amendment will have done no harm anyway, I believe.

Mr. COSTIGAN. My question relates to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. May I again ask what I think was, in substance, my first question, whether under the Senator's amendment—which I did not fully hear when it was read—there would be a tax levied on Philippine sugar imported into the United States equivalent to the processing tax levied on sugar produced in the continental United States? If so, is it the purpose of the Senator's amendment merely to transfer to the Philippine treasury the tax collected here on Philippine sugar?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I understand the Senator now. My amendment does not make the covering-in charge apply to the Filipinos. Any processing tax which might be levied on any products which they might raise would not be levied upon them by the amendment. The amendment only provides that in case the tax is levied on their products, the tax shall be covered back into the Filipino treasury and not into our own.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In view of the Senator's statement that he will defer further consideration of the amendment, I shall take the opportunity afforded to examine it before the discussion proceeds.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I invite the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the provisions of subsection (f) of section 10, on page 15, as follows:

> The provisions of this title shall be applicable to the United States and its possessions, except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Canal Zone, and the island of Guam.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from South Carolina is correct and if he will read the wording of my amendment he will see that it provides "to which this title does not apply shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury." The amendment presupposes what the Senator from South Carolina has said. It only provides that in case by any construction put upon the bill as a whole the tax does apply, then those taxes shall be recovered by the Filipinos and not by our own Treasury.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, the Senator proposes to treat the Filipinos just as we treat American citizens?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. SMITH. He would give them the benefit of the tax for them to use as it is to be used here?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina from what section he was reading?

Mr. SMITH. I read from subsection (f) of section 10 on page 15.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Then may I ask the Senator from South Carolina to direct his attention for a moment to subsection (e) on page 21, lines 6 to 8?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; that was discussed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator will observe that part of that provision relates to a compensating tax on any article processed from a commodity "imported into the United States or any possession thereof to which this title applies." That obviously does not include the Philippines.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator is right, as I understand it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. But the language continues, "or from any possession of the United States to which this title does not apply", and that does cover the Philippine Islands, according to the legal construction which was given yesterday and which appears to be confirmed on reexamination.

Mr. TYDINGS. And because I was inclined to feel that there was ambiguity there, that there might be two constructions placed upon it, I have offered my amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In other words, the purpose of the amendment, so far as the Senator from Maryland is concerned, is to effectuate in more precise language the construction involved in lines 7 and 8, "any possession of the United States to which this title does not apply", as interpreted by me a moment ago?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the answer to the Senator's interrogatory is yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It has no other purpose?

Mr. TYDINGS. It has no other purpose except that in the event a tax is collected on Filipino importations, it shall revert to the Filipino treasury and not to our Treasury. If no tax is levied, then obviously the amendment does not mean anything.

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I said, I shall ask the able Senator to allow me to examine the amendment further before it is acted upon.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it be possible under the Senator's amendment for the native government to redistribute the tax in the form of a bounty to its own sugar people?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think it could do so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In which event there would be, of course, an unfair differential against American-grown sugar on the continent. I submit that to the Senator's thought with the idea that perhaps it would be wise to perfect his amendment before it finally comes to a vote, because I do not believe he wants that to happen.

Mr. TYDINGS. In the first place, I do not believe we should have brought the Filipino sugar question into this matter at all because it will be recalled that in the Philippine independence bill we limited the amount of sugar they can ship into the United States. There is no way they can ship more than that, even if they pay the tariff, without breaking faith with us. We limited the amount to 850,000 tons a year.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of making the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is not in order because we are considering amendments to title II of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken, but the Senator from Maryland has the floor, and the Chair understands that when a Senator gets the floor he may talk about anything on the face of the earth.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I understand the purpose of the allotment plan it is in the first place to encourage the reduction of acreage. We have encouraged the reduction of acreage in the Philippine Islands in another way; that is, we have reduced their market about 25 percent already by the quota we allow them to bring into the United States. That is reduced now without any of these benefits. It is now proposed to tax the processor over there for the benefit of the sugar people here. It is totally wrong, because it is an extra cost on their sugar coming in here that is apportioned for the benefit of those in the United States.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado for a question.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Does the Senator from Nevada mean that he approves or disapproves the amendment tendered by the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think it is the only just thing we can possibly do. We have restricted their acreage by restricting their market 25 percent. Now we add to the cost of that production by the allotment plan. The proposal puts this tax on, and it is added to the total cost of the sugar that comes to this country, and that without any of the reciprocal benefits to the producer that will occur so far as the United States is concerned.

We have maintained the principle that we are not going to tax those people under our tariff law or any other law so long as they were a part of our dependency. Therefore, even in the act, when a progressive tariff commences to run against them, it is in the form of an export tariff they put on and that money goes back into their treasury to refund their bonds. This is practically the same thing here.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is understood that Philippine sugar will enter the American market on an equal basis, so far as the processing or compensating tax is concerned, with American sugar.

Mr. PITTMAN. It will so do under the provision because the processing charge will be added.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Under the provision of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. In the meantime all of our products are entering the Philippines absolutely duty free.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator that all these limitations upon Philippine imports to which he refers are not calculated to become effective at least for 1 year, and probably not for 2. Therefore that phase of his premise is not appropriately invoked in the argument.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not agree with the Senator's conclusion, because sugar cannot be raised in a day or a month, and with that hanging over the market the curtailment must take place long before the Philippine Government actually acts. I am sure the Senator from Michigan will concede that if it seems likely the Independence Act will be approved by the Filipino Legislature it will cause sugar growers all over the island, knowing that their exports are to be limited to 850,000 tons a year, to plant less, because a part of their existing market will have been removed when they adopt that charter. I apprehend that they will plant less long in advance of the actual passage of the act itself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. They will plant less just as soon as the matured crop would have to be curtailed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But for the next year, and that is the immediate crisis we are trying to serve through the bill, there is no limitation. My only quarrel with the Senator is that when the tax is reimbursed to the native government, as I think it should be, it should not go through the back door back to the producer again, because that puts the native producer in a favored position in respect to our own.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not entirely sure the amendment will cure that matter, but may I say to the Senator from Michigan that while that may be desirable I do not think the United States ought to tell the Filipino people where to spend the money in their own treasury. We have not told them that about anything else, and I do not think as to this tax, which is put on them without their consent, without even an interrogatory being addressed to them, that when the money is collected we should dictate in what manner in that free government it should be expended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Consideration of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland is passed over. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] as amended.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following amendment which I offer to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 6, after the word "exceed", strike out the numerals "4½" and insert in lieu thereof "3½."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, there is probably no subject that is of keener interest in the agricultural areas of this country at the present time than the interest charge. This amendment is simply an effort to get this system to function under a 3½-percent-interest rate rather than a 4½-interest rate to the borrower. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has just succeeded in having adopted here an amendment by which he suggested that we could save one half of 1 percent. There are 2 or 3 reasons why this amendment should be adopted.

In the first place, there is the extreme necessity of having the borrower receive the money at the lowest possible rate. That necessity exists everywhere in the farming areas of the country. In the second place, this is a new step forward, so far as Federal land-bank bonds are concerned, whereby the Government is coming in and making the interest a Federal obligation. That should put these securities almost in a class by themselves. That being the case, it seems to me that we should be able to make the system function at a lower rate of interest.

In support of this contention, I send to the clerk's desk a letter from one of the leading farm organizations of the country and ask that it be read in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 13, 1933.

Senator L. J. DICKINSON,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR DICKINSON: In the consideration being given to title II of H.R. 3835, I wish to call your attention to the rate of interest, 4½ percent per annum, specified in line 17, section 24, page 31. Under present conditions 4½ percent is too high for farmers to pay for money on farm mortgages, and, in fact, such a rate is too high even if farm prices might materially increase. The price of money must come down in our whole Nation and, in fact, needs to come down on farm mortgages, which are as stable security as can be offered by any borrowers.

The American Farm Bureau Federation for several years has had a standing committee investigating various phases of rural credits, and the report of this committee year after year is regular in asking for lower interest rates than are now paid on farm mortgages.

You will be serving the interest of agriculture if you can present an amendment striking out the 4½ percent rate and inserting instead 3½ percent. This will bring the price of money used on farm mortgages down to an approximate level of the price which the Federal Government pays for money which it borrows.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY, Washington Representative.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President——

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have been, of necessity, out of the Chamber, and I should like, if I may, to address a question to the Senator from Iowa in this connection. When he speaks of 3½ percent, do I understand that he refers to the mortgage rate from the standpoint of supporting a 4-percent Government-bond issue?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is correct.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I have every reason and desire to agree to everything that my friend and colleague on this side of the aisle wants, but I do not see how a 3½-percent mortgage rate can possibly support a 4-percent bond. Obviously, it cannot do so.

Mr. DICKINSON. The theory that I have here is that under the provisions of this bill we are saying now that the interest on these bonds shall be guaranteed by the Government. That makes the bond practically a Government bond. The lower the bond can be sold the cheaper the money can be loaned, and I believe there is sufficient margin here to work out this matter.

Heretofore we have had a 5½ percent rate with a 5 percent bond. If these bonds are going to be Government bonds, it seems to me that we should be able to sell them at 3 percent, and in that way the farmer should be permitted to receive this money at a 3½ percent rate.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I will conclude by saying that I have exactly the same feeling that the Senator from Iowa has in respect to the desire that the farmer get his money at the lowest possible rate; but I am not able to see how even a mortgage of 4½ percent is going to be able to support a bond issue of 4 percent, making any allowance for expenses or losses. I had that criticism—if I may use that term in a friendly sense—in relation to the proposal of the Senator from New York, and have had in mind asking him how he can justify this insufficient margin or spread.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if the Senator had done me the honor to listen to me when I was attempting to explain the bill he would understand that under the provisions of this bill the Government is giving a subsidy of $15,000,000 for the first year—it probably will be a little less the next year—to make up that very difference. What we are doing now is this: We are taking all outstanding mortgages, which are now paying between 5½ and 6 percent, and we are reducing the rate of interest on them to 4½ percent. Now, the outstanding bonds are bringing 4½ percent. Thus there is no money at all left for the expense of administration. In other words, the farmer is getting the money for exactly what its costs the Farm Land Board to borrow the money from the bondholders.

That difference of operation the Government is paying by way of whatever we may call it—a contribution, or a subsidy, or what not—and I am for that. I do not apologize for my vote upon that question; but we are actually now providing that difference, and the Senator wants us to pay even more. After all, the taxpayer will have to make that up. If the Senator succeeds in reducing the interest rate to 3½ percent, it means that we shall have to increase our appropriation by at least $15,000,000, or more.

That is as to the outstanding mortgages. As to the future, it may very well be that the interest rate will be reduced below 4½ percent, because the Senator will notice that we are not fixing the rate at 4½ percent. We are saying that it shall not exceed 4½ percent. Now, if we sell these bonds upon which the Government guarantees the interest at 3 percent, then the farmer under the general statute will have to pay only 4 percent for his mortgage, because the farm-land bank is not authorized to charge more than a spread of 1 percent between the price of the bond and the price it charges for the mortgage. So it may very well be automatically, if we succeed in getting money at a low rate of interest, that we would be able to do exactly what the Senator proposes; but now he is attempting to reduce the interest rate upon the outstanding mortgages, and the Government, the taxpayers, will have to supply that difference in the form of a subsidy, and we shall have to double the amount which we are now appropriating.

I do not think the Senate wants to go quite that far.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, my suggestion is simply this:

With all of the benefits that we are giving to every other line of industry in this country, if an extra $15,000,000 is necessary to make up the difference in these interest rates I know of no class of people who are more entitled to that consideration than the landowners who are borrowing money.

I desire to suggest one more thing: I understand from the current atmosphere around here today that money is going to get cheaper, and I believe land is going to be better security. Therefore we ought to be able to borrow money against it at a lower rate of interest; our bonds ought to sell at a better rate of interest; and, all in all, I do not think the fact that we have to make a little additional appropriation should discourage us in reducing this rate. The only thing that I think ought to discourage us in reducing the rate would be the fact that we could not make the system function for the new loans. I believe it can be made to function, in view of all the conditions that we are facing at the present time.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, I agree that as we raise commodity prices, to that extent the debts will be less oppressive; and we hope that will happen. The Senator understands, however, that we are also making an appropriation here to provide for installment payments that otherwise would have to be made by the farmer upon his outstanding mortgage. In other words, we give him a breathing spell of 5 years, during which time he does not have to pay any of the principal, and the Government is supplying that difference to the banks in order to keep them solvent.

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand.

Mr. WAGNER. And, besides, in cases where the facts justify it, the farmer may also have an extension of 5 years for the payment of his interest. During that time the Government is carrying the burden, and properly so; but I do not think the Senate is prepared to go to the point the Senator suggests.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I believe the point made by the Senator from Iowa is well taken. We have here a bond guaranteed by the Government as to interest. It is exempt from all tax. We give it the privilege of rediscounting under the 15-day provision at the Federal Reserve banks. In addition to that, we make it a legal tender for the payment of a debt after 5 years.

An ordinary 3-percent Government bond which is no better than this has been selling around 98. These bonds should sell almost as well, if not as well, as the present 3-percent Government bonds.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. If they do, the farmer will get the benefit of that reduced rate, because the farm-land banks cannot charge more than 1 percent over the amount which they have to pay for the money.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What do they charge that 1 percent for?

Mr. WAGNER. That is to cover the cost of operation. That provision has been in the law ever since the farm-land banks were created; and it has been discovered in some years to be not quite sufficient to pay the operating expenses of the banks.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. One percent?

Mr. WAGNER. One percent. That is the general amount.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In this bill we provide for one half of 1 percent.

Mr. WAGNER. No; we do not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We sell a 4 percent Government bond, and we write the interest in the mortgage at 4½ percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; we do that, and the Government is making up the difference by an appropriation right in this bill. We are making up the difference.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is, assuming that there is a difference.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; but we are actually making it up as to those bonds which are outstanding now. The outstanding bonds bear 4½ percent interest, and the banks have been getting 5½ percent on the outstanding mortgages, and that 1 percent has been used to pay for the operation of the banks. In some instances they have had a loss. It has not been enough. Now, however, we are reducing the interest rate on all outstanding mortgages to 4½ percent, the exact sum which the bank is paying its bondholders for the money. Therefore, there is not any spread to pay for operating expenses; and that difference the Government is making up by an appropriation in this bill. It is an unrepayable appropriation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand, the reduction in the carrying charge to the farmer is limited exclusively to the elimination of the amortization payment of 1 percent. The cost of operation comes out of the 4½ percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no; I did not make myself clear.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The carrying charge is reduced from 5½ percent to 4½ percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The difference is the amortization payment, the payment on the principal, amounting to 1 percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no; I did not make myself clear.

The farmer borrows money from the bank. The bank pays 4½ percent for that money to its bondholder; and, in return, it loans it to the farmer for 5½ percent. That 1 percent difference it uses for the expenses of operation. We are now horizontally reducing the interest on all of those outstanding mortgages from 5½ percent to 4½ percent, so there is nothing left with which the land bank can pay its expenses of operation; and that 1 percent difference we are making up by an appropriation to the Federal land bank to cover the cost of operation. So that is a clear subsidy that we are giving for the benefit of the farmer in giving him this reduced rate of interest.

I may add this one other point, and then I will have finished. As to the new loans which are to be made, as to whether the interest will be 4½ percent or 3½ percent depends on what the land bank would have to pay for the money. If, as some predict, it can sell the bonds on which the interest is guaranteed by the Government at 3 percent, the farmer will have to pay only 4 percent interest upon his mortgage. If it sells them at 2½ percent, the farmer will get his mortgage for 3½ percent. In other words, there can be no more than 1 percent spread between the price paid for the money and the interest paid upon the mortgage.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator, under this bill the rate of interest on the present outstanding mortgages is reduced by 2 percent. One percent, the Senator says, is for cost of administration, and the additional 1 percent represents a 1-percent amortization payment.

Mr. WAGNER. No; we are not dealing with the amortization. So far as payment upon the principal is concerned, we are postponing that for a period of 5 years. The farmer does not have to pay any amount of the principal for a period of 5 years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That reduces the carrying charge.

Mr. WAGNER. We are reducing his interest by 1 percent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But it reduces his carrying charge for the period of 5 years the amount of 1 percent.

Mr. WAGNER. Eventually he will have to pay it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Eventually he will have to pay it?

Mr. WAGNER. The amortization is simply postponed for a period of 5 years, and then it will begin again.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The difference between the Senator and me is that I was talking about the carrying charge of the mortgage, and the Senator was speaking of the interest rate. I think the Senator understands the difference.

Mr. WAGNER. That is not what the Senator from Iowa was discussing. He was talking about interest on mortgages.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, it is true, I assume, as the Senator from New York says, that if they can sell these bonds for 3 percent under the law, the farmer will get the benefit of the reduced rate of interest on the bonds as reflected in what he has to pay on his mortgage. But I want to say to the Senator that if under the bill a consolidation of the farm and mortgage business into one agency occurs, undoubtedly that agency will have to take over, in the last analysis, most of the farm-mortgage business of the country; and if that agency cannot administer its business for less than 1 percent interest, then I think the bill will fall far short of what it was intended to accomplish.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, the experience has been that it has cost more in many instances, and in other banks the spread is larger than 1 percent. I think the Federal land banks are conducted very well and very economically, or they could never get along on a spread of 1 percent, because, after all, their activities are spread throughout the country.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Their overhead charge has been heavy because they have carried a limited amount of loans. Now they are practically going to carry them all.

Mr. WAGNER. The reason for that is that they have not been able to get any money. They have not been able to sell any bonds with which to make loans. We hope that through this means they will be able to sell these bonds, with the interest guaranteed by the Government, and secure money to refinance the farmer.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if it is in order, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] is pending.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on this amendment, I want to make this suggestion: The principal objection of the Senator from New York against the amendment is the fact that it would make necessary an additional appropriation in order to make up the difference between the rate of interest charged and the rate of interest paid. It seems to me that such an appropriation could well be allowed by Congress at this time. I see nothing in the statement of the Senator from New York which would prevent the operation of this bill at a 3½-percent rate in normal times. Therefore, it seems to me that in this emergency Congress could well afford to grant this additional favor to the borrowers of the Federal Land Bank System, and let the additional appropriation be made to make up the deficit. I certainly hope the amendment will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. BARKLEY. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Byrnes	Erickson	King
Ashurst	Capper	Fletcher	La Follette
Austin	Caraway	Frazier	Lewis
Bachman	Carey	George	Logan
Bailey	Clark	Goldsborough	Lonergan
Bankhead	Connally	Gore	Long
Barbour	Coolidge	Hale	McAdoo
Barkley	Copeland	Harrison	McCarran
Black	Costigan	Hatfield	McGill
Bone	Couzens	Hayden	McKellar
Borah	Cutting	Hebert	McNary
Brown	Dickinson	Johnson	Metcalf
Bulkley	Dieterich	Kean	Murphy
Bulow	Dill	Kendrick	Neely
Byrd	Duffy	Keyes	Norbeck

Overton	Robinson, Ind.	Stephens	Van Nuys
Patterson	Russell	Thomas, Okla.	Wagner
Pittman	Schall	Thomas, Utah	Walcott
Pope	Sheppard	Townsend	Walsh
Reed	Shipstead	Trammell	Wheeler

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word before this amendment is voted on.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, and ask that the same be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to submit an amendment and to have it printed and lie on the table. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in reference to this amendment, will the Senator allow me to say that a number of members of the Banking and Currency Committee have suggested that we ought to have a chance to make a little inquiry about the amendment, and make some study of it. They feel that it ought to go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I do not want to delay the bill, and I do not think it would delay the bill. I can call a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee for tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, and we can study the amendment up to 12 o'clock. I hope the Senate will take an adjournment to 12 o'clock so that we will have 2 hours in the committee to afford an opportunity to examine the amendment. I think we would save time by that, rather than have it thrashed out here in the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I rose a moment ago to voice my objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] and, at the same time, to appeal to him to have the amendment referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I make this suggestion to the Senator for the obvious reason that the amendment involves subject matter probably more important than any legislation that has been before the Senate in the last decade. A standing committee of the Senate should be permitted to investigate the proposal, to hold hearings, if necessary, and to have high officials of the Government come before it. It is not fair to the Senate to have a proposal of this kind submitted in the form of an amendment, whatever the measure may be. There are Members of the Senate who are not in favor of the agricultural bill, but are in favor of the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma, and we cannot unite the two and fairly permit a Senator to express his views.

I think the proposal of the Senator should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency for investigation, and it should be brought into the Senate as a separate measure and stand on its own legs. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma, in fairness to the Members of the Senate—and he always is fair—will ask that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. In the absence of such a request, at the proper time, when the amendment is submitted, I shall move to refer the amendment to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McNARY. I object until I may have an opportunity to get a reply from the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I think I have the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is correct. He yielded for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Oklahoma to present a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Oregon, but I merely want to have an understanding as to which of us has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. In withholding at this time permission to have the amendment printed, I had hoped that the Senator from Oklahoma might give an expression as to his attitude with respect to the reference of the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, has the amendment been accepted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. The pending question is on its acceptance under the unanimous consent which the Senator from Oklahoma has requested.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is now 5 o'clock, and no doubt the Senate would not stay in session to consider the amendment tonight. It is out of the ordinary for an amendment to be referred to a committee. Personally I could not consent to that. I have no objection, of course, to offering the amendment and having it printed and then having it come before the Senate tomorrow, when every Member of the Senate may have a copy of it. At that time if a motion shall be made to refer the amendment to a committee, we can consider the motion on its merits.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that the Senator from Oklahoma has offered or may offer his amendment, and I yield to him for that purpose, will it then be in order for me to move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendment shall be formally offered as an amendment, it will be in order for the Senator from Kentucky to move to refer it to a committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Oklahoma desires to take that course, I am willing to yield to him to offer the amendment. Then I will make that motion. I think the Senator will gain time in the consideration of his amendment by that course. As a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I think I can assure him for myself and my colleagues on the committee that we shall consider the amendment tomorrow morning, and I hope that we may report it back by the time the Senate meets. It seems to me that would be more satisfactory than to try to offer the amendment here on the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Until the amendment is accepted by the Senate, it certainly is not subject to any action. If the Senate will accept the amendment, then I shall be willing to consider its disposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. What does the Senator mean by "accepting the amendment"?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The amendment has not been yet offered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am willing to yield to the Senator to offer it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. It was I who objected to the proffer made by the Senator from Oklahoma, for the purpose of ascertaining his state of mind with regard to it and of expressing my view that the amendment should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I say again it should not be offered to this bill; but if the Senator from Oklahoma is willing to have the amendment referred to the committee, I shall be glad to withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for the purpose indicated by me a moment ago, if he desires now to offer his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Except by unanimous consent, the Senator from Oklahoma cannot offer his amendment until the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] shall have been disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent Mr. President, that the amendment may be accepted, printed in the RECORD and thereafter printed for the convenience of the Senate, and then that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD, printed for the convenience of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PITTMAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment at this time; and if the request be granted, he will offer the amendment, and it will then be referred to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair, and the request was so stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand, Mr. President, that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency thinks that the report of the amendment may be ready by 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not quite understand the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the Senator from Florida stated that he thought a report could be made on the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Oklahoma by noon tomorrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so, but I thought the request was that we be ordered to report by 12 o'clock, and I do not know whether or not we can do that.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, there is so much disorder in the Chamber that I cannot hear what is being said. What was the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas made no request. He merely announced his understanding that the report on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma would be available at noon tomorrow.

Mr. LONG. As I understood the Senator from Florida, he stated that he thought a report could be here by 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Louisiana has concluded his interruption. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, which was ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, is as follows:

On page 43, after line 5, to insert:

"PART 6. FINANCING—AND EXERCISING POWER CONFERRED BY SECTION 8 OF ARTICLE I OF THE CONSTITUTION: TO COIN MONEY AND TO REGULATE THE VALUE THEREOF

"SEC. 34. Whenever the President finds, upon investigation, that (1) the foreign commerce of the United States is adversely affected by reason of the depreciation in the value of the currency of any other government or governments in relation to the present standard value of gold; or (2) action under this section is necessary in order to regulate and maintain the parity of currency issues of the United States; or (3) that an economic emergency requires an expansion of credit; or (4) that an expansion of credit is necessary to secure by international agreement a stabilization at proper levels of the currencies of various governments, the President is authorized, in his discretion—

"(a) To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into agreements with the several Federal Reserve banks and with the Federal Reserve Board whereby the Federal Reserve Board will, and it is hereby authorized to, notwithstanding any provisions of law or rules and regulations to the contrary, permit such reserve banks to agree that they will (1) conduct, pursuant to existing law, throughout specified periods open-market operations in obligations of the Federal Government or corporations in which the United States is the principal stockholder; and (2) purchase directly and hold in portfolio for an agreed period or periods of time Treasury bills or other obligations of the United States Government in an aggregate sum of $3,000,000,000 in addition to those they may then hold, unless prior to the termination of such period or periods the Secretary shall consent to their sale. No suspension of reserve requirements of the Federal Reserve banks, under the terms of section 11 (c) of the Federal Reserve Act, necessitated by reason of operations under this section, shall require the imposition of the graduated tax upon any deficiency in reserves as provided in said section 11 (c). Nor shall it require any automatic increase in the rates of interest or discount charged by any Federal Reserve bank, as otherwise specified in that section.

"(b) If the Secretary, when directed by the President, is unable to secure the assent of the several Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board to the agreements authorized in this section, or if operations under the above provisions prove to be inadequate to meet the purposes of this section of this act, or if for any other reason additional measures are required in the judgment of the President to meet such purposes, then he is authorized—

"(1) To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued in such amount or amounts as he may from time to time order United States notes, as provided in the act entitled 'An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption of funding thereof and for funding the floating debt of the United States', approved February 25, 1862, and acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, in the same size, and of similar color to the Federal Reserve notes heretofore issued, and in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, and $10,000; but notes issued under this subsection shall be issued only for the purpose of meeting maturing Federal obligations to repay sums borrowed by the United States and for purchasing United States bonds and other interest-bearing obligations of the United States: Provided, That when any such notes are used for such purpose, the bond or other obligation so acquired or taken up shall be retired and canceled. Such notes shall be issued at such times and in such amounts as the President may approve, but the aggregate amount of such notes outstanding at any time shall not exceed $3,000,000,000. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to retire and cancel 4 percent annually of such outstanding notes and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to retire and cancel annually 4 percent of such outstanding notes. Such notes and all other coins and currencies heretofore or hereafter issued by or under the authority of the United States shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private.

"(2) By proclamation to fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains nine tenths fine at an amount that he finds is necessary from his investigation to protect the foreign commerce of the United States against the adverse effect of depreciated foreign currencies, or in case the Government of the United States enters into an agreement with any government or governments under the terms of which the ratio between the value of gold and other currency issued by the United States and by any such government or governments is established, the President may fix the weight of the gold dollar in accordance with the ratio so agreed upon, and such gold dollar, the weight of which is so fixed, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity with this standard and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity, but in no event shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed so as to reduce its present weight by more than 50 percent.

"SEC. 35. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to make and promulgate rules and regulations covering any action taken or to be taken by the President under subsection (a) or (b) of section 34.

"SEC. 36. (a) The President of the United States is authorized to accept silver, in amounts not to exceed in the aggregate in value, in the United States currency $100,000,000, in payment of the whole or any part of any amount of principal or interest due from any foreign government or governments on account of any indebtedness to our Government, such silver to be accepted at not to exceed the price of 50 cents an ounce. The authority of the President to accept silver as herein authorized shall be limited to a period of not to exceed 1 year from the passage of this act.

"(b) The silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this section shall be subject to the requirements of existing law and the regulations of the mint service governing the methods of determining the amount of pure silver contained, and the amount of the charges or deductions, if any, to be made; but such silver bullion shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion authorized or required to be purchased and coined under the provisions of existing law.

"(c) The silver accepted and received under the provisions of this section shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to be held, used, and disposed of as in this section provided.

"(d) The President shall cause silver certificates to be issued in denominations of $1, to the total number of dollars for which such silver was accepted in payment of debts. Such silver certificates shall be used by the Treasurer of the United States in payment of any obligations of the United States.

"(e) The silver so accepted under this section shall be coined into standard silver dollars and subsidiary coins sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet any demands for redemption of such silver certificates issued under the provisions of this section, and such coins shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of such certificates on demand. The silver so obtained and deposited under this section, except so much thereof as is coined under the provisions of this section, shall be held in the Treasury for the sole purpose of aiding in maintaining the parity of such certificates as provided in existing law. Any such certificates or reissued certificates, when presented at the Treasury, shall be redeemed in standard silver dollars, or in subsidiary silver coin, at the option of the holder of the certificates: Provided, That, in the redemption of such silver certificates issued under this section, not to exceed one third of the coin required for such redemption may in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury be made in subsidiary coins, the balance to be made in standard silver dollars.

"(f) When any silver certificates issued under the provisions of this section are redeemed or received into the Treasury from any source whatsoever, and belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation; but nothing herein shall prevent the cancelation and destruction of mutilated certificates and the issue of other certificates of like denomination in their stead, as provided by law.

"(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this section."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if we may get back to the subject which I desire to discuss for just a moment, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, on page 6, line 6, I want to say that representatives of the Federal Farm Loan Board, testifying before the Committee on Banking and Currency, stated that it will be absolutely necessary to have a spread of at least one half of 1 percent above the price of the bonds which they expect to sell to obtain money to loan to the farmers at 4½ percent. The bill provides for 4 percent on these bonds. We all know that for 2 or 3 years the Federal land-bank bonds have not been selling at all, and that we had to appropriate $125,000,000 in order to pump new money into the Federal land-bank system so as to maintain Federal land-bank bonds at anything like normal prices. With the present condition of the money market it is utterly impossible to sell these farm-loan bonds at a rate of interest below 4 percent; it may be doubted whether they will sell even at that; but certainly we cannot sell bonds at 4 percent and then loan out the proceeds of those bonds at 3½ percent.

Much as I would desire to see the rate of interest reduced to the farmers on these loans to 3½ percent, we are now providing for a reduction of 1 percent and an extension of the time within which there can be no foreclosures. If we adopt this amendment providing for loans to farmers at 3½ percent, when we are paying 4 percent to get the money, the $15,000,000 which we are already appropriating to make up the difference for administration expenses will have to be multiplied to about $50,000,000. Therefore, it seems to me to be ridiculous to adopt an amendment for the loan of money at one half of 1 percent less than we pay for it in order to get it to loan in the first instance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). Upon this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mrs. CARAWAY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who, I now understand, is absent. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. AUSTIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the negative). I find I have a pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I am unable to obtain a transfer, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. DICKINSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is an amendment which I had intended to propose while other amendments offered by myself were before the Senate, but which I overlooked at the time. I submit the same to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and also to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

On page 21, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "in chief value from such commodity" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in substantial part from such commodity or commodities."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I overlooked an amended form of section 5, on page 4, which the Department desires in lieu of section 5 as previously submitted. I send the amendment to the desk and ask its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from South Carolina proposes, on page 4, to strike out section 5 and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 5. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and directed to advance money and to make loans to the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire such cotton and to pay the classing, carrying, and merchandising costs thereon, in such amounts and upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with such warehouse receipts as collateral security: Provided, however, That in any instance where it is impossible or impracticable for the Secretary to deliver such warehouse receipts as collateral security for the advances and loans herein provided to be made, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may accept in lieu of all or any part thereof such other security as it may consider acceptable for the purposes aforesaid, including an assignment or assignments of the equity and interest in the Secretary in warehouse receipts pledged to secure other indebtedness. The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Has the substitute of the Senator from New York been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from New York has not been disposed of, and the amendment just submitted by the Senator from New York may be considered only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, did the Senator from South Carolina offer his amendment on page 3 to section 1?

Mr. SMITH. No. It is offered on page 4, an amended section 5. It is an amendment which I overlooked.

Mr. McNARY. Has it the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. It was sent down by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] if he will not permit an amendment to his substitute so that the matter at least may go to conference and be there considered? It is provided that where foreclosure has been made within a year, the owner may have the opportunity to come under the provisions of the bill. The Senator realizes, as I am sure other Senators do, that in 1931 the Federal land bank foreclosed on a great many farms, and I am wondering if the Senator would not permit us to insert "1931" instead of the limitation of 1 year?

Mr. WAGNER. I have no objection to such an amendment going to conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. In a State where there is no period of redemption at all and the purchaser at a foreclosure sale obtains a sheriff's deed which passes title absolutely, does he not think his suggestion would be ex post facto?

Mr. HARRISON. Then there would be no way to compromise on the matter.

Mr. WAGNER. Unless the right of redemption exists, nothing can be done.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will let it go to conference for consideration there.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 17, lines 18 and 19, strike out "within 1 year prior to the approval of this act" and insert in lieu thereof "at any time between January 1, 1931, and the date of the enactment of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I desire to submit for the consideration of the Senator from New York in the hope that he will let it, too, go to conference. On page 17, line 19, of the Senator's substitute it is provided that a person must actually live on the farm in question. There are innumerable cases in the country where a farm might be owned, for instance, by a widow or someone else who might be living in town, but the farm would be the sole source of support. It seems to me the words in line 19, page 17, "and occupied by him as a home" might very well be stricken out. I offer that as an amendment.

Mr. McNARY. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not understand the proposal of the Senator from Mississippi. Will he state it again?

Mr. HARRISON. In the substitute as well as in the bill it is provided that the farms must be occupied as a home. I invited the Senator's attention to the fact that there are innumerable cases where the party may not actually live on the farm, but it is still the sole source of income. I have moved to amend by striking out the words "and occupied by him as a home." I may say that if the conferees do not accept it, I shall make no further objection. I move that the words referred to be stricken out.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, of course, it extends the provisions of the section, but if it is the sense of the Senate that the matter ought to be extended, I have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the matter may well go to conference.

Mr. WAGNER. I have no objection to it going to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 17, line 19, the Senator from Mississippi proposes to strike out the words "and occupied by him as a home."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Missouri offers the following amendment: On page 21, line 16, after the word "applicant", insert the following:

Subject to the conditions and limitations of this section, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may also accept from the governing boards of duly organized drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts other than Federal projects, a pledge of issued and/or outstanding evidences of indebtedness, upon such terms as said corporation may deem advisable, and the money loaned on such pledge shall bear interest at the rate of 4 percent annually.

Mr. CLARK. The purpose of the amendment is that while under the laws of certain States such districts as are enumerated in the amendment may borrow upon their securities, yet the same result can be accomplished by depositing the securities of the drainage district or other improvement district under the conditions set forth in the amendment. Under our Missouri statute, for instance, it is an extremely cumbersome process to refinance a project, but by depositing all the bonds of an improvement district with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purposes and under the limitations provided in this section, the same result can be accomplished with very much less difficulty.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does this pertain to private reclamation, irrigation, and levee districts?

Mr. CLARK. It applies to all the improvement districts provided for in the section.

Mr. McNARY. Must they be organized under the statutes of some State?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. It does not apply to voluntary organizations?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no. It must be a political subdivision as contemplated by the section.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator would not be willing to eliminate the words "other than Federal projects" from his amendment? Will he not be willing to strike out that phrase?

Mr. CLARK. I am willing to accept that modification. I understood the section was not supposed to refer to Federal projects.

Mr. WAGNER. It deals only with completed projects, does it not?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, is the amendment or substitute of the Senator from New York still pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York as amended.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, is my substitute in order now?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the Senator from North Dakota offers his substitute I have an amendment to offer to the amendment of the Senator from New York. I send it to the desk and ask that it may be stated.

Mr. WAGNER. Is this an amendment to the substitute which I have offered?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; it is.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Minnesota proposes the following amendment:

On page 13, between lines 18 and 19, insert:

"(c) Before any joint-stock land bank shall receive a loan as provided for in this section such bank shall enter into an agreement with the Farm Loan Commissioner (1) that such bank will pay, in purchasing its own outstanding farm-loan bonds paid for out of the proceeds of the loan, an amount not to exceed 110 percent of the amount which such holders may have paid for their bonds prior to April 17, 1933, but in no event to exceed the face value of such bonds, together with the accrued and unpaid interest thereon; and (2) that whenever any such bonds are so purchased by such bank at a price less than the amount of the face value of such bonds, together with accrued and unpaid interest thereon, the difference between such face value and interest and the amount paid for such bonds by the bank shall be credited pro rata to the borrowers from such bank in reduction on their loans outstanding at the time of such purchase."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to give the benefit of the liquidation to the borrowers of the Federal joint-stock land banks.

Under the provisions of this bill, these banks are to be liquidated. A loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of $100,000,000 is provided to be loaned to the joint-stock land banks to be used in liquidating the liabilities of the joint-stock land banks.

In furnishing this money to the joint-stock land banks, there are certain benefits that ought to accrue to the borrowers, the debtors of the bank.

The bonds of these banks are at a great discount. They will have to be retired. They are liabilities of the banks. No one would buy them except the banks themselves, because investors know that they are to be liquidated. Consequently, there will be a monopoly in the purchase of these bonds. This amendment provides that in retiring these bonds, the joint-stock land banks shall not pay to the holders of the bonds more than what they paid for the bonds, plus 10 percent, but in no event shall they pay more than par.

If an original purchaser of a joint-stock land bank bond paid $100 for it, and still has that bond, all he has to do is to show to the Government agency that he paid 100 cents on the dollar for the bond, and he gets his money back. If, however, the bond has gone from the original purchaser, and he has lost title to it, and a speculator has bought it for 6 or 7 cents on the dollar, he cannot get par for the bond. He gets his money back, plus 10 percent.

That is one provision of the amendment.

The amendment also provides that the difference between the par value of the bonds retired and the price paid for the bonds shall be reflected pro rata to the borrower in reducing his liabilities, because as the bonds are retired at a discount, the liability of the bank is retired; and the borrowers from the banks should get the benefit of what is saved. What is saved is a loss by the original purchasers of the bonds. They have sold the bonds. They have taken a loss. Nothing can be done for them, because they have lost title; but by adopting this amendment the borrower from the bank can be given the benefit of the savings made in purchasing these bonds at a discount in the market, for which this bill makes provision that money shall be furnished.

That is about all there is to the amendment. There is a possible saving here to the borrowers from the joint-stock land banks of something like $200,000,000 or more.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in my judgment this amendment should not be agreed to.

We have already incorporated in the bill a provision—a modification of an amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota—authorizing borrowers to use bonds issued under the terms of this act in liquidation of their debts due the banks, under certain conditions. This amendment would prevent any joint-stock land bank from buying bonds and paying therefor in excess of 110 percent of the amount which the holders paid.

That would operate in this way:

Some of the joint-stock bank bonds were bought at par. Others were bought at different times for 20, 50, 70 percent. Those who bought bonds at par could, under the terms of this amendment, demand 110 percent, or 10 percent in addition to the par value of the bonds. Those who bought at, say, 40 percent would be placed at a disadvantage.

In addition to that, the result would be that the market for bonds, insofar as purchases by the banks themselves are concerned, would be closed. Any bank buying bonds must of necessity pay substantially the same price to all those who wish to sell at a given time. It would be unjust to deny the bank the opportunity to purchase its own bonds, and to place an arbitrary price on the bonds, particularly when that price would vary so greatly as I have already stated.

Some of these bonds now are very low. Some of them were recently purchased at a very low price, while other bonds of the same bank were long ago purchased at comparatively high prices. The net result of this amendment would be to limit the banks in the purchase of bonds to a very few transactions—that is, to instances where they might be able to find bonds which the holders are anxious to dispose of at a very low price.

The second objection to this amendment is one that I think is unanswerable.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I confess that I am in a state of confusion about this amendment and its effect. I wish to get it clear; and I am asking my question, not by way of controversy but wholly for information.

Do I understand that the amendment proposes to limit the profit to be made by a joint-stock land bank upon the purchase of its bonds with the Government money?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It prevents the joint-stock land banks from obtaining any profit whatever; but it does more than that, if the Senator will permit me to state the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I wanted to get that clear. It fixes it so that the joint-stock land bank cannot take the public money and make a profit on it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to get that clear.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is not the main proposition, however. If I may have the opportunity of presenting the thought that is in my mind, I think I can make clear to the Senator from North Carolina that the best joint-stock land bank in the system in all probability would go into the hands of a receiver, in spite of any provision in this bill, should it obtain a loan from the Government and should this amendment be imposed as a condition of the loan.

The first proposition is that before any joint-stock land bank shall receive a loan, it must enter into an agreement with the Farm Loan Commissioner that in purchasing its bonds out of the proceeds of the loan it will not pay more than 110 percent of the amount which the holders paid for their bonds prior to April 17, 1932. I have explained that the prices which have been paid by the present holders of bonds range from, say, 25 percent of the par value to par itself.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator at that point?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand the proposition, then, upon borrowing this money the bank can lift the price of its own bonds with the Government money, to the benefit of the holder of the bonds, of course, and not to any benefit whatever to the farmers of America.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That statement is not entirely accurate.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to get it right. I am not trying to be controversial.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator will give me an opportunity, I will discuss the amendment and try to show wherein it is objectionable.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall be very happy to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have said that as a result of this provision relating to the limit on the cost of the bonds there would be the greatest discrimination between holders of bonds. The bank ought to be permitted, if it chooses to buy its bonds, to pay a uniform price for them at the time it is entering into purchasing transactions. It ought not to be required by law to pay 110 percent of the face value in order to obtain some of its bonds, and at the same time be permitted to pay, say, 30 percent of the face value in order to obtain other bonds. That would necessarily result in limiting the transactions in the bonds to a very few cases.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the amendment provides that in no case shall the bank pay more than the face or par value of the bond. If an original purchaser has a bond which he purchased for $100, that is all he can get for it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; 110 percent of the face value; and, at the same time, if a man has another bond of the same bank and the same issue for which he paid 40 percent, the bank could purchase it for $44—that is, assuming the par to be $100. The bank would have to pay for one of the bonds of the same issue 110 percent, and for the other 44 percent, which, of course, would mean that it would close to the banks the right to make purchases.

The law requires joint-stock land banks to use their funds, when they are available, for the purchase of their own securities upon the market. That is one of the provisions of the Federal Farm Loan Act.

In the second place, the provision which requires the bank to reflect, in the obligations due it, any profit made on the bonds would prevent the bank from obtaining loans or would result in placing the joint-stock land bank in receivership. There is not a joint-stock land bank in the United States that would not go into receivership if it made large loans and used the proceeds to buy its bonds. The one in North Carolina probably would go into receivership immediately, because, to state it in a clear way, what the amendment would do would be to require a bank which has a debt of $1,000 due it to receive in full a bond that it can dispose of for only $400, if the market value of the bonds is 40 cents on the dollar. Of course, there would not be a loan, not one loan, made under the provisions of the bill if this amendment were inserted. The banks would have to go on attempting to liquidate without any loans, and there probably would not be a single loan made by the joint-stock land banks.

All these bonds are greatly depreciated on the market, some of them much more than others, and if the bank had to take them at par, or had to reflect the profits it makes on its own bonds, it would not be enabled to carry on a successful liquidation. That is the only way by which it can prevent itself from experiencing a default in the payment of its maturities.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. What effect would the enactment of this measure without the amendment have on the prices of the bonds on the market?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should think it would be calculated to increase to some extent the prices of the bonds. That is a mere opinion of my own.

Mr. COUZENS. Every indication would be that the bonds would rise in price after this proposed act was passed?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. And the holders of the bonds which were bought at these low prices would get an unearned profit on the bonds, which would be brought about by mere act of Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They would be advantaged by it. Most of the purchasers, I think, bought the bonds when they were much higher than they are now, and probably higher than they would become under this proposed law. I do not know what the effect on the market would be of the passage of this measure. I should think it would be calculated rather to improve the prices of the bonds.

Mr. COUZENS. What has been the experience as to the prices paid for the bonds under the act referred to by the Senator a while ago where the joint-stock land banks were empowered to use their surplus money to buy up bonds?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They bought them as cheaply as the market permitted. As far as I know, they have been able to stay out of receivership solely because of the profits they have made in buying their own obligations. There are not many in the system of which I have any knowledge that would not be in the hands of receivers now if it were not for that fact, and the reason for that I think I can make so plain that it will not be difficult to understand.

These banks all do business on a margin of 1 percent; that is, they are permitted to charge just 1 percent more than they pay for the money they use. If their bonds bear 5 percent interest, they are permitted to make loans at 6 percent. If their bonds bear 4½ percent, they are permitted to make loans at 5½ percent. In that 1 percent must be comprehended all losses and overhead. The overhead is always considerable, and it is greater in a time like this than it is in normal times, for the reason that there is more trouble in making collections and in procuring extensions for the bank's own obligations.

There is not one joint-stock land bank that has made net profits in recent years. Not one of those banks has declared a dividend in recent years. Many of them have been thrown into receiverships for the reason that the 1 percent which they are permitted to charge as a profit, or as a fund out of which to absorb overhead and losses has proved wholly inadequate for that purpose.

In many of these banks the loans due the banks are in default to the extent of as much as 45 percent—that is, practically half of the loans due the banks are in default—and when such a condition arises it is manifest that the bank does not collect enough to meet its own maturing obligations. The 1 percent is entirely inadequate to cover that deficit. So the only way the bank has been able to survive is to go out on the market and buy its bonds at the market price and then pay the losses and the deficits out of the profits made in the transactions.

If we deny them that opportunity, or if we place as a condition of the loan a requirement that they cannot make any profits, then they cannot meet their obligations, because instead of making collections, they are taking over enormous amounts of real estate. Some of them now own millions of dollars worth of real estate, which constitutes a charge and a burden rather than a source of profit to the banks, and if we take away from them any privilege of making profit on their own obligations, we probably will put them in a condition where bondholders may throw them into receiverships.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator stated what would happen if we took away from them the privilege of making a profit. The proposition here is neither one of taking away nor of giving a privilege. The proposition here is to use the public funds of the country, the taxpayer's money, which is a public trust, and the objective is not to enable any bank on earth that I know of to make money or to save itself, but the object is to help the farmers of the United States. I want the bill looked at, and I want to look at it, in that respect. I am not against the banks, let it be understood.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will say this, that if the Senator wished to destroy the joint-stock land banks—and I am serious about this—if the Senator had that purpose, he could accomplish it by putting into the law a provision of this sort, insofar as any loans made by the Government are calculated to prevent receiverships and to promote voluntary liquidation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator's argument is that we must allow the banks to use this money in the way provided in the bill in order that they may save themselves and thereby help the farmer. That is the argument.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; in a sense; if they are thrown into receiverships, all the obligations are subject to foreclosure, and not only is the bank declared insolvent but the whole business of the bank must be liquidated through court proceedings; and one of the objects of this bill is to avoid that, and to permit slow and voluntary liquidation.

The banks will not be permitted to make new loans; that is, to issue new bonds with the privileges which attach to the present bonds. The whole object of this provision, insofar as joint-stock land banks are concerned, is to enable them to liquidate in an orderly manner. We do not expect them to make profits. They cannot have any profits or pay any dividends. The only thing they can hope to do is to work themselves out, and meet their obligations as they mature, and when they fail to do that, they are likely to be thrown into receivership.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator this question. In the case of joint-stock land banks which are already in receivership, would they be permitted to come in under the benefits of this act?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; they would be permitted to have some of the advantages of the proposed law, and it is necessary to so provide, for the protection of the persons indebted to the banks.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator in that. I was not very certain, from reading the measure, whether those banks would be entitled to the benefits of the proposed law.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me state the difficulty in my mind. I know, as a matter of fact, that the bonds of the land banks are selling at $40 on the hundred and less. I suspect that under the bill, by the use of public funds, the bank may buy in those bonds at $40. Where a bond was purchased for $40, that would cancel a hundred-dollar debt of the bank, and the bank would get a profit of $60, as against its original liability of $100.

Now let me state my trouble and the difficulty, and perhaps the Senator can clear it up. Why can we not so devise, since the funds are public money and the bill has the objective of helping the farmer, that somewhere in that profit of $60 the farmer will get some consideration? That is all I propose. If we cannot do it, well and good. I am not arguing that we should do the impossible; but if we can do it, we must do it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Benefits accrue to the farmer under other provisions of the bill. He is permitted to buy a bond after there have been five maturities on his obligation to the bank, and take that bond, a bond issued under the terms of this proposed law——

Mr. BAILEY. Why not let him have the money and let him buy it? The proposal is to lend the bank money and let them buy the bond. Why not lend the farmer the money and let him buy it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We are proposing to lend the banks money for various purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Why not lend the farmer the money?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That could be done, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the farmer would get the benefit.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it is impossible for a bank to make a loan if the result of the loan is to counteract the purpose for which the loan was made, namely, to keep the bank out of receivership, and if we denied to banks the privilege of buying their own bonds we would render them all insolvent at once.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, under the proposed law, and under the statement of the Senator, we are to use the taxpayers' money, a public fund, which is a trust, a trust for the welfare of the whole Nation if it is a trust at all, in such a way as to enable the land bank to make a possible profit of $60 in the cancelation of its debt. Would it not be an incomparably better and wiser thing to use the $2,000,000,000 by way of enabling the farmers to cut their debts 30 percent?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In the refinancing operations contemplated by the bill, it is expected that they will be cut in many cases more than 30 percent.

Mr. BAILEY. More than 30 percent?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to get at those provisions. The provisions of the proposed law would give the farmer a breathing spell, they would give him a lower rate of interest; but wherein would the bank cut down the balance due by the farmer?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Federal land bank, which is assisting in the liquidation of the joint-stock bank, buys a mortgage at less than its face value, it must reflect the benefit of that purchase to the farmer.

Mr. BAILEY. That is, the farmers' mortgage?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. But if it buys its bonds at less than the face value, with the farmer's money—because it comes out of him—the farmer gets no benefit from that. That is the proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But he does get the benefit as reflected in the other provisions. We cannot keep these banks liquidating if we take away from them all sources of income. A bank cannot go on and collect the amounts that are due it from its debtors. It must waive the right to proceed in foreclosure, and if the obligations of the borrower are refinanced all reductions or scalings down must be reflected for the benefit of the farmer. The bank cannot collect now one half enough from its borrowers to pay the maturities on its bonds. It really is not a profit which offsets losses: it is merely a method by which the bank is enabled to survive and to give to the borrowers the benefits of extensions and reductions.

I have said all I care to say.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator will yield, I think there is one other thing which has been overlooked. In the case of joint-stock land banks the bank must agree to reduce the mortgage interest to 5 percent, and for a period of 2 years they are restrained from bringing foreclosure proceedings.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I mentioned that; I spoke of the reduction of the interest rate and the extensions that were required to be made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as I understand the provisions made for the farmer by this bill he does get a lower rate of interest; he does get a short extension; the judgment day is postponed—that is all that means—or his principal account is reconstructed and he is given credit for the payments made up to date and a new balance is struck, a new principal is fixed. That is relief; I like those provisions; I am for them all; but what troubles me is that we are taking the public funds to enable the banks to buy in their bonds and save $60 on the hundred of their debts, and the farmer gets nothing whatever out of that.

On the other feature of the bill, taking it as a whole, if we let these banks go into the hands of receivers, as the Senator suggests they may do, and sell out the farmers, take this public fund, get the title to their land, let the farmer go into bankruptcy, where he is already, and convey the land to the farmer's wife, we can deliver the farmer at, I should say, 40 cents on the dollar of what this bill will cost us; and frankly I am interested in the bill only insofar as it affects the farmers; I am willing to stand by the banks and for other methods only insofar as those banks and those other methods will relieve the farmer. That is the objective of this bill. I am not prepared to come to a conclusion on this amendment at this time; and I submit we ought not to let the bill go through; we ought not to pay out $2,000,000,000 without seeing to it that every possible dollar that can be brought home to the deliverance of the mortgage burden of the farmers of America shall be brought home, especially when we are protesting and declaring that that is our purpose.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he intends to go on further tonight with the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. The only thing that stands between us and a recess is the disposition of the Senator's amendment. If he desires, we can vote on the amendment and then take a recess.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I am not ready to vote now. I want to speak further on this amendment, and I want to speak quite extensively. When this amendment is disposed of, I have another one to offer which may lead to some debate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill, House bill 3835, as amended up to date, may be printed for the use of the Senate, so that we may see what we have done up to the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand there is a desire to have an executive session; so I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

COMMISSIONER GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. COOLIDGE. From the Committee on Immigration, I report, with the recommendation that it be confirmed, the nomination of Daniel W. MacCormack, of New York, to be Commissioner General of Immigration, Department of Labor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire would there be any objection to confirming the nomination of Mr. MacCormack as Commissioner General of Immigration? It has been reported unanimously from the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nomination of Mr. MacCormack. Is there objection?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I do not know anything about this nomination; I am not advised whether the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is interested in it. He is absent from the floor just now, and, under the circumstances, I wish the nomination may go to the calendar.

Mr. KING. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be placed on the calendar.

CONVENTION WITH MEXICO

Mr. CONNALLY. From the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report, with the recommendation that it be ratified, a convention with Mexico concerning the rectification and fixation of the boundary of the Rio Grande River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty will be placed on the calendar.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further reports of committees? If not, the calendar is in order.

COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination of John Collier to be Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, is that a nomination that has just been reported from the committee?

Mr. WHEELER. It was unanimously ordered reported from the committee on yesterday, and the report was submitted this morning.

Mr. HEBERT. I am informed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] that the Senator from Oregon would not object to the course suggested being taken. Therefore I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the President may be notified of the confirmation of Mr. Collier's nomination to be Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. COPELAND. But, Mr. President, before the order is made to notify the President—and I am not going to object to it—I want to call attention to the fact that the Seneca Indians, having a reservation in my State, are opposed to the confirmation of Mr. Collier. I feel it necessary to say this because they do live within the borders of my State, and there are many Indians there. They are very much dissatisfied with the selection of Mr. John Collier for this office, and I feel that I should place in the RECORD, and I ask permission to do so, a telegram from the Seneca Nation. I shall not burden the RECORD with the letters which I have received, but ask that the telegram may be printed in the RECORD to show the protests of that group to this particular nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the telegram will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

BUFFALO, N.Y., April 15, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Having declared yourself as friend of the oppressed Indians, we implore you to stop confirmation in Senate of John Collier's nomination as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, at least until we can be heard on this vital question. Let this be a nonpolitical appointment for once in history. Letter follows.

RAY M. JIMERSON,
President Seneca Nation of Indians.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the President be notified of the confirmation? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James A. Donohoe to be United States district judge, District of Nebraska.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the nomination which we are now considering was reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that that is correct. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. SMITH. I withhold the motion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have talked with several Senators and I want to make a suggestion, to which I should like to have the attention of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I think that we are all impressed with the amendment that has been offered to this bill and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. We expect the Committee on Banking and Currency to report tomorrow at 12 o'clock. I am just as anxious as any Senator possibly can be to expedite the consideration of the pending bill, but the amendment which has been referred to the committee this afternoon is more important than the entire bill and more important, Mr. President, than any legislation we have passed at this session.

I know there is a feeling on the part of some Senators that as to this very important matter an effort is being made to proceed at a rate that is inexcusable under the circumstances. I sympathize with them; but I am not making my suggestion as one who is unfriendly to that amendment. I have examined it hurriedly at my desk, and I expect to support it, unless I am convinced that there ought to be some change in it; but I realize, as I think every other Senator does, that it is proposed in that amendment to take an exceedingly important step, and I should very much dislike to have the charge made that we had considered it precipitously and had prevented proper consideration by the committee. The committee will only have two hours. I do not expect them to be ready to report at 12 o'clock, unless they give it merely casual consideration.

Now I want to make this suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina and to the Senator from Arkansas. Would it not be better temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business, the agricultural relief bill, in order to give the Committee on Banking and Currency a longer time in which to consider the amendment? We do not need to lose any time, as we can go on with some other measure that I think we are prepared to take up and consider. So I suggest to the leaders, would it not be a good idea temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business until Monday, and that tomorrow at 12 o'clock we take up the Muscle Shoals bill, which we shall be able very likely to dispose of before the week is over. Thus we will lose no time; I understand that bill is to follow the pending bill, anyway, and it will enable us to give more systematic and judicial consideration to the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has expressed the opinion that the committee would be ready to report at 12 o'clock tomorrow. Other members of the committee have made the same statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection I think what the chairman said was that the committee would try to report and hoped that it might report tomorrow noon. Arrangements have already been made to have 2 or 3 or more important men, who had something to do with the framing of the amendment, appear before the committee tomorrow morning. That is an entirely proper procedure. No one can tell whether the committee can in 2 hours agree on all the provisions or not, so it is entirely within the possibilities that the amendment will not be reported back before 12 o'clock, although I am sure every member of the committee wants to do so if he can consistently give it the consideration to which it is entitled.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In addition to the statement I made a moment ago, may I say that there is yet at least one very important amendment to the farm bill that is to be considered and disposed of. I refer to the Carey amendment. It having no relationship to the subject matter of the amendment referred this afternoon to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I suggest that of necessity we should go ahead and dispose of that amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I think we had better go on and finish consideration of the farm bill because there are other amendments that are going to be offered. It may be that the Committee on Banking and Currency will in the meantime have digested the inflation amendment and gotten it ready. I want to impress on this body that if we can have expansion of the currency it may be a good thing. We have all seen the effect of just the preliminary steps toward inflation. Commodities have all gone up, and if that is an evidence or proof of what we or at least some of us have been maintaining would take place—that if we could get a proper expansion of the currency all this legislation would not be necessary—it will be well to consider that amendment very carefully. But while the Committee on Banking and Currency shall be considering it, let us finish up the work we started out to do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will withdraw from my contention as gracefully as I can. I would not have the bill laid aside without the consent of the Senator from South Carolina. I am one who feels like complimenting him for the ability and patience which he has displayed in the consideration of the bill. I had no such idea as to try to interfere with his plans. He is in charge of the bill and I want to follow him. I did think, however, that the suggestion I made was one of importance. It seemed to me it would in the end save time. I anticipate that tomorrow there will be much longer debate on the amendments that are being presented than there would be if we were not waiting, as we probably will be, for the report of the committee on Banking and Currency. When that report comes in, we may have very important changes in the amendment. There is no telling what form the amendment may take. We will perhaps be asked to take it up without its being possible to have it printed in its amended form. I wanted to avoid that hasty consideration of such an important thing. However, I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry, as one of the junior members of the Banking and Currency Committee? Whether the committee shall report back the amendment as suggested depends on whether or not the Senate wishes the Banking and Currency Committee really to give consideration to the amendment or whether it wishes to use the committee as a mere conduit to get it through in a hurried way. It is not possible to consider the amendment in the 2 hours which have been allotted. The Banking and Currency Committee can submit it to the Senate after a mere cursory examination.

My inquiry is whether or not the Senate really wants the Banking and Currency Committee to give the amendment due consideration or whether Senators merely want us to hurry it through and bring it back to the Senate without that due consideration to which some of us believe it is entitled. For one, I should not want to take the responsibility of having somebody say the committee had considered the amendment in all its important phases in 2 hours and passed it on to the Senate of the United States with the approval of the committee.

RECESS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think it is a debatable question whether the Senate would consider it improved or not after the Banking and Currency Committee had gotten through with it; but we will not enter into a discussion of that question. Therefore I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p.m.) took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, April 21, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 20, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, again Thou hast been our refuge and our strength. We praise Thee, our blessed Heavenly Father; Thou art so infinitely good, absolutely and eternally merciful. Let these marvelous blessings inspire us to renewed effort and consecration to the painful needs of our country. O fill the whole spheres of our daily labors with fruitfulness, with vision, and with victory. Make our ideals lofty, our sympathies intense, and our service heroic. Arouse all breasts with a master passion, and may nothing lack of fullness of thoroughness and persistency of wise understanding. Direct us, Heavenly Father, to stand for the just and labor for the helpless, reclaim the fallen, and lift the downtrodden. In all wisdom, in all strength of mind, body, and soul, abide with our President. In these hours of his arduous burdens, merciful God, do not fail him, but comfort him with the richest of all rewards. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, April 18, 1933, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H.Con.Res. 15. Concurrent resolution creating a joint committee to investigate the causes of the wrecks of dirigibles.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered in the House of Representatives caucus room on Wednesday, April 19, 1933, by Lawrence Dennis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, was this speech the one delivered in the House caucus room?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the gentleman who delivered the speech a Member of Congress or an ex-Member.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire what right or privilege there is for any outsider using the House caucus room. How does he get the invitation?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Speeches by outsiders are frequently made in the caucus room of the House. Members of Congress occasionally arrange these meetings after securing permission from the House Office Building Commission. I made arrangements for the speech of Dr. Dennis. I acted within my rights in doing so. Dr. Dennis spoke last evening upon my invitation. He made a speech that was enjoyed by about 75 Members of the House, many of whom urged me to have it inserted in the RECORD for the information of Members who were not present and for the edification of the people of the country as well. I am confident the gentleman from New York will be profited by reading the speech. I invite his attention to it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not objecting to the gentleman's speech being printed in the RECORD. What I want to call to the attention of the House is the use of the House caucus room. In my 12 years here I do not recall any instance of visitors speaking in the House caucus room. If we grant the right to one person, how are you going to refuse it to others? If a visitor, on the invitation of a group of Congressmen, can use the House caucus room to discuss controversial subjects like inflation or deflation or other subjects, I think it is a situation to which the House ought to pay attention right now, because if you grant it to one you must grant it to others, and it may lead to great embarrassment.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, let me say the caucus room is under the control of the House Office Building Commission, and that Commission alone can permit its use for other than official business.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All right; I am not criticizing the Commission, but I do think the danger should be called to the attention of the members of that Commission. On Monday I wrote to the Speaker about it, sent copies to the majority leader and the Chairman of the Rules Committee. I had no interest as to any particular speech, but I do feel that if you start granting this permission you are going to have to grant it to everyone.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I feel that speeches from outstanding Americans are helpful to Members of Congress. The caucus room should be used oftener and meetings held there should be better attended. It is particularly unfortunate that the gentleman from New York sees fit to stay away from them. He was invited to hear the speech last night.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the request of the gentleman from Mississippi, as to the nature of the speech, and by whom it was made. All we could understand was it was something about the caucus room.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I asked permission to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a speech delivered last night in the caucus room by Dr. Lawrence Dennis. Dr. Dennis for about 12 years was in the Diplomatic Service of the United States, later was with the international banking firm of J. & W. Seligman, and during the past 5 years has been an independent writer, largely upon financial and diplomatic subjects. His book, Is Capitalism Doomed? was published by Harper & Bros., of New York.

Mr. TREADWAY. Has he any official connection with the Government?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. None that I know of.

Mr. TREADWAY. I object.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. LYNN S. HORNOR, a Member-elect from the third district of West Virginia, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

USE OF HOUSE CAUCUS ROOM

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] with respect to using the caucus room is very timely. I am on the House Office Building Commission with my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] and the Speaker as chairman. We have agreed on a few occasions upon the request of our colleagues on this floor that the caucus room could be used where there was no suggestion of any financial reward for persons who were delivering addresses on subjects that threw light upon legislation. We have drawn the line right there. We have declined to allow the caucus room to be used for social functions and wherever we thought there might be a selfish purpose involved, as, for instance, in an attempt to advertise somebody or something. We have felt that it is not improper when a request has been made for the use of the caucus room, and where our colleagues on either side of the Chamber desired, it should be used to grant its use for the discussion of subjects that throw light upon legislation. That is as far as we have gone.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. CULLEN. The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is chairman of the Rules Committee, and as such has jurisdiction, as I understand it, over the House Office Building, which includes the caucus room?

Mr. POU. That is correct. The caucus room is under control of the House Office Building Commission, of which the Speaker is chairman.

Mr. CULLEN. And the natural way to get permission to use the caucus room is to at least consult with the chairman of the House Office Building Commission.

Mr. POU. Really the proper way of approach would be to request the Speaker grant the permission desired, but I have undertaken to relieve the Speaker of that responsibility, in cooperation with the other member of the Commission, my friend from New Jersey, Mr. BACHARACH.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is understood, then, is it, that there shall be no use of the caucus room unless by permission of the Commission that has it in charge?

Mr. POU. It is never used except by permission granted by the House Office Building Commission, and, so far as I recollect, that permission has always been unanimous except possibly in one instance, when I could not get in touch with the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. BLANTON. Absolute confidence may be placed in the House Office Building Commission to grant the use of the caucus room only for proper purposes and upon proper occasions. It is most wise that its use should in all instances be passed upon by such Commission. Its control has never been exercised in any arbitrary manner.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. I know of no reason why the caucus room should not be used for the purposes to which the gentleman has referred. There is no reason why we should deny a group of the Members of the House the privilege of meeting in the caucus room to discuss legislative or economic problems and to call to their assistance men of distinction who are students of political and economic problems. Certainly this Congress is not going to say to the people of the United States that Congress is so self-centered that we will not allow an outstanding student of economics to discuss matters of that kind in the caucus room, especially at night, when Congress is not in session and when the caucus room is not needed for other purposes. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Why does not the gentleman go the full way and let them in on the floor to advise us?

Mr. LOZIER. Oh, that is an entirely different proposition. Certainly this Congress will not go to the unreasonable extreme of saying to the American people that we will shut our ears to all suggestions from the outside in reference to legislation intended to meet the present unprecedented emergency, restore normal conditions, and set once more the faces of the American people toward prosperity. I did not attend the meeting to which reference has been made; but I see no impropriety in allowing scholars, publicists, economists, and other students of public affairs to speak in the caucus room. Such meetings should be encouraged and not prohibited.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I have asked the gentleman to yield for the purpose of stating that I went in the usual way, together with other persons who sponsored this speech, and asked through the gentleman's office for permission to use the caucus room, and that that permission was granted.

Mr. POU. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the views expressed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]. I am one Member who is always ready to receive information. I can get it from my erudite colleagues when I have time to consult them, but I cannot always reach all of them when I most need their advice. I have been splendidly edified by addresses made in the House Office Building by distinguished gentlemen with reference to various subjects. I hope the rule will not be adopted to deny to the Members of the House seeking information opportunity to call distinguished scholars, statesmen, economists, men of renown, to give us the benefit of their thought on big subjects.

I call attention to one statement made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], who particularly objected because this particular address deals with a controversial subject. I call the attention of the Speaker and my colleagues to the glorious fact that since yesterday, when that magnificent President of ours took the bit in his teeth and said something directly to the ears of the international bankers, the subject discussed last night is no longer controversial. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman think the speech of this outsider last night, who got all of the publicity he wanted, had anything to do with influencing the President's judgment?

Mr. HOWARD. No. The President had acted before this gentleman spoke. The new President of ours is a leader and not a follower.

REFINANCING OF AGRICULTURAL LOANS AT LOWER RATES OF INTEREST

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota requesting the lowering of interest rates in the so-called "farm-relief measure."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Mike Holm, secretary of state of the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy with record of the original instrument in my office of H.F. No. 1954, being Resolution No. 19, laws of Minnesota, 1933, filed in this office on the 15th day of April, A.D. 1933, and that said copy is a true and correct transcript of said instrument and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in St. Paul, this 17th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL]

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

Joint resolution to the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States concerning national legislation providing for refinancing of agricultural loans at lower rates of interest

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota—

Whereas an emergency exists in this State whereby large numbers of farmers therein have lost or are losing their life's earnings for failure to meet interest payments through no fault of their own, with present conditions and high interest rates continuing, that such an emergency will continue for an indefinite time unless remedied by national legislation, providing for refinancing of farm loans at lower interest rates.

Whereas, due to the emergency now existing, the interests of both borrowers and lenders on farm lands within this State are mutual, that interest rates are so high and price levels are so low that borrowers are unable to pay existing rates, and lenders are unable to collect, due to the situation thus created.

Whereas it is the desire of the legislature of this State that occupying farm owners be permitted to refinance farm loans at lower interest rates, making possible for them to remain in their homes, and, inasmuch as there is now pending a refinancing bill in the Congress of the United States, which provides for administration, methods of financing, and reduction of interest rates to 4½ percent; therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That we regard such rates as provided for in this refinancing measure as too high to be of sufficient value to the farmers of Minnesota at this time and therefore we urge the Congress of the United States to lower the interest rate provided for in this bill to 3 percent per annum.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
N. K. SOLDBERG,

SPENDING OUR WAY OUT OF THE DEPRESSION

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered in the House of Representatives' caucus room last night by Mr. Lawrence Dennis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, out of courtesy to my friend from Mississippi, I will not renew the objection I made a few moments ago. I personally do not approve of the system of inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD speeches by men who are simply private citizens, no matter how valuable their opinions may be; but out of respect for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], I will not renew the objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if it is the desire of Members of Congress to see that speeches of individuals, made any place in the United States, shall be inserted in the RECORD and have free distribution, I am inclined to object. I think speeches of that kind should be sent out over the country at the expense of those who are interested in doing it. I do not believe that the speeches which are proposed to be put in the RECORD should be taken up as a matter for the Federal Government and the taxpayers to pay for. For that reason, I think I shall object.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. RICH. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. There were about 75 Members of the House of Representatives present when this speech was delivered, and at least 50 percent of those present asked me to make this request, and I hope, under the circumstances, the gentleman will not object.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, if there has been a request by 50 Members of this Congress that this speech be inserted in the RECORD, then I shall not object; but if it is a matter of individuals coming here and making speeches and then asking them to be inserted in the RECORD, I will object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered in the House of Representatives caucus room Wednesday, April 19, 1933, by Mr. Lawrence Dennis, formerly of United States Diplomatic Service and of J. & W. Seligman & Co., of New York, author of Is Capitalism Doomed?

Do we need more or less production and consumption at the present time? If the answer is that we need more production to employ our idle labor and capital and that we need more consumption to reduce human misery and raise our standard of living, then the next question is: Must we spend more money? If one has a religious prejudice against the very act of spending money, one may reply that we ought to consume more while spending less, and that in order to do this we ought to lower prices still more. If, however, one has no religious taboo against spending money, one must accept the obvious conclusion that we ought to spend more in order both to produce and consume more.

It is amazing to what absurd lengths intelligent people will go these days in developing depression cures which can be guaranteed to involve no additional spending by the State or, in most cases, by anyone else. These cures recall the French proverb about making omelettes without breaking eggs. Past recoveries have invariably come about through increased spending or increased investment somewhere in the world. Increased investment, of course, has meant increased spending on the creation of productive capital. No people ever emerged from a depression by practicing economy. We got out of past depressions by squandering hundreds of millions of dollars on the construction of railways and new communities, while our Government gave away hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of land and vast sums of public money to war pensioners of the Republic and others, including promoters of railways.

The theory of the economy school of thought is that Government expenditures should be reduced so as to make more money available for productive business enterprise. This theory assumes that business needs more productive capital, which is obviously not true. It also takes for granted the proposition that if the income of the state or the individual is reduced, the state or the individual should reduce expenditures at once and thus diminish the incomes of other people.

The theory ignores the truism that one man's income is another man's expenditure and its corollary that what is one person's expenditure must always be another person's income. Nor does the theory recognize that the order of time sequence of diminishing incomes and expenditures is this: Expenditures are first reduced, thereby reducing incomes. The starting or causal factor of the present depression, so far as America is concerned, was really that of the net result of all the decisions of the American people in 1929 as to personal expenditures and investments. The net result of all decisions, just when money income was highest, was that we began spending less on personal consumption and the creation of new capital. This can be proved by statistics of total production, money payments, and investment on new capital. Notwithstanding the fact that the total amount of money income reached in 1929 a record all-time high for the United States, it happened toward the middle of that banner year that total expenditures for consumption and the creation of new capital began to decline. The decline in consumption and new investment then started has continued at varying rates of speed during the 3 years that have since elapsed; and the decline is in progress at this very moment. Now this decline simply cannot stop unless and until the result of all the decisions of the people and the state, taken in combination, is an increase in total consumption and/or investment. When total expenditures for consumption and capital goods increase, the Nation's income will increase automatically and simultaneously.

THE ECONOMY OR SCARCITY THEORY: MORE DEFLATION

The underlying theory of both the Hoover and the Roosevelt administrations is that, inasmuch as income is declining (by reason of decreasing expenditures), all public expenditure must be contracted at the same rate at which private income and expenditure are being reduced. This theory amounts to saying that the Government ought to help the depression to get worse. The supposition is that government and other consumptive expenditure should be reduced so as to make more money available for productive enterprise. It is forgotten that business does not need productive capital, but more consumption by customers. It is taken for granted that if the income of the State, a corporation, or an individual is reduced, a corresponding reduction in expenditure will furnish the remedy. It is ignored that what is one man's expenditure is another man's income. Nor is it recalled that the genesis of a depression is the first net reduction in total expenditure, which, of necessity, imposes or effects a net reduction of total income. Then the vicious circle or downward spiral is started. Then deflation goes on—not to infinity but to zero.

ECONOMY DOES NOT STIMULATE NEW INVESTMENT

The economy theorists assume that after expenditures have been pared down to the bone there must burst forth a new wave of investment on credit. But they forget that this sequel to previous depressions was a feature of a hundred-odd year period of industrial and territorial expansion which may now be over. They also overlook the fact that nothing whatever in the nature of the events of a depression generated these new investment booms of the past, but that such recoveries were due mainly to the settlement of free lands by European emigrants. They also forget that Europe had a depression for hundreds of years from the fall of the Roman Empire to the discovery of the Americas. A war, of course, might come along any moment and consume and destroy so much property that a reconstruction boom of several years' duration might follow. A war, however, might also leave civilization in ruins and usher in a long period of world chaos.

Mr. Roosevelt, out of loyalty to this theory of Government economy, has made a virtue of lopping off a billion dollars from the ordinary Budget, largely at the expense of the salaries of civil servants and the pensions of veterans. Fortunately, this Federal economy is to be largely, though not entirely, offset by appropriations under "extraordinary" budgets for public works, reforestation, and other relief projects. Men costing the Government $1 a day to keep in the Army are to be discharged and men taken on at a cost of $3 to $4 a day in the reforestation corps. In such ways is economy to be effected and the Budget balanced. The billion-dollar deficit of the ordinary Budget is being eliminated by calling such a deficit an extraordinary budget, emergency relief, or a capital budget.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

"Balance the Budget" is the war cry of the members of the economy school, but they propose to do it by reducing expenditure instead of by increasing revenue. Now it would be foolish to deny that the Budget should be balanced or that, in the long run, it is balanced. If a budget is not balanced in a given period entirely by taxes, it is balanced in that period partly with loans. If the loans are subsequently paid off 100 percent, it then happens that taxes balance the Budget. If the loans are not subsequently paid off 100 percent—that is to say, if the state defaults on the public debt or if it devalues the currency—it still holds true that taxes balance the Budget, because lenders, through such default, are taxed the amount which is due but not paid to them. So all budgets are balanced—in the short run sometimes by taxes and loans, in the long run entirely by taxation.

To say that a government cannot tax as much as it can spend or that a government can ever spend beyond its income is nonsense. The fact that the Government spends is proof that the Government can get the money. And any money the Government can spend, it can take by taxation. To say that the people will not stand for something is only another way of saying that the Government does not want to do it. Resistance to taxation, however, if carefully analyzed, will usually be found to be resistance to inequality of the incidence of taxation or to be simple opposition to making certain expenditures instead of certain others.

The people who are constantly crying "balance the Budget" when they really mean "reduce Government expenditures and throw Government employees out of work", forget that if, as is roughly the case, 25 percent of our income goes in taxes and nearly one third of our income in taxes or other payments for the cost of government, it is by the same token true that one third of income comes from the Government. A reduction in Government expenditure will help the general economic situation only if the saving on taxes is used to support a larger amount of private spending, financed through private credit, than the amount reduced in public spending. It must not be forgotten that every cent of money the Government spends makes up the income of private citizens. Not a cent of Government expenditure is lost. Why is it morally desirable to save money on public health, public instruction, or national defense so that people can spend more on chewing gum and cosmetics? Why is it preferable to have men on the dole to having them teach school or render useful services to the community?

The idea that people owning capital will invest more money once they see taxes reduced is an error. Capital is never more eagerly invested or money for personal consumption more generously spent than in war time when the public Budget is least balanced with taxes. It is obvious that any reduction of Government expenditure is a reduction of that part of our national income which today aggregates about one third.

ECONOMY HAS FAILED TO STIMULATE INVESTMENT

The economy measures of neither Mr. Hoover nor Mr. Roosevelt have stimulated one cent of additional investment or increased consumption in the United States. The proof of this sweeping statement is found in the statistics of steadily declining expenditures either for new investment or current consumption. Our national income has fallen from $85,000,000,000 in 1929 to less than $40,000,000,000 in 1932, and it is still falling. Wage payments have dropped to less than half their 1929 volume and are falling every week. Is it to be expected that capitalists will invest new money to produce for a steadily shrinking national market? Every Government employee thrown out of work is one less customer for business and one more potential candidate for the reforestation corps or some other form of dole.

GOVERNMENT ECONOMIES SET EXAMPLE FOR WAGE CUTS IN INDUSTRY

The prophets of economy are going on from one triumph to another. The same reforms will soon be introduced into railway administration. Thousands of superfluous employees and thousands of miles of unneeded trackage will be scrapped. It is only a matter of months until the idle inhabitants of large towns will be walking to neighboring towns on the few remaining railway lines left in operation. They won't be going to catch trains but to see the daily train make its stop. There is obviously no need for transportation facilities for communities which cannot sell their products at a price to pay transportation costs. The way to economize on the railroads is the same as the way to economize on government; don't use them.

MORE MONEY IS NOT NECESSARILY MORE SPENDING

To spend more and, hence, to consume more, it is not enough to create more money and more credit. Were our Government to print and give to every person $100, the $13,000,000,000 so distributed might all at once be spent on new purchases to the temporary revival of trade. But as we have over $150,000,000,000 of debt outstanding, we could well expect that once the $13,000,000,000 had been spent and turned into our banks, this money would disappear in the extinguishment of so much debt. Maintaining adequate consumption is a problem of spending enough money indefinitely—not just for a year. It is not a problem of having enough money to spend. We have enough money at present to put every worker and factory to work.

DEFLATION: LESS MONEY TO SPEND AND A SLOWER RATE OF SPENDING

Bank deposits in the United States have dropped from about $60,000,000,000 in 1929 to less than $40,000,000,000 at present. Probably if all banks were made really sound, bank deposits would be further written down by another $20,000,000,000 in the processes of liquidation. Not only has the volume of bank money shrunk, but the velocity with which it is currently spent has slowed down by two thirds of the 1929 rate. In other words, we have a third less money, and we are spending what we have two thirds less fast. Inflation and deflation are terms which apply to the speed with which money is spent as well as to the quantity of money. Most inflationists overlook this simple fact, believing that an expansion of the volume of money would automatically produce inflation. Conceivably we might double the amount of money on the books of the banks and still have less spending, if everybody chose not to spend or invest more than at present.

OBJECTS OF PUBLIC EXPENDITURES

Now for the oft-repeated question "What should we spend more money on?" The answer, of course, is "On anything we want." I assume that everybody in America has not everything he wants or could produce and earn if given a chance to work. If the State has to do the additional spending to restore prosperity and put people to work, the objects should be slum clearance, municipal beautification, public works, and all sorts of social services which would make life more agreeable. Slum clearance could well absorb $100,000,000,000 in the next 10 years and still leave many American cities behind the best model German towns. All such expenditures would be utterly nonreproductive in a commercial sense, but they would make America a better place to live in. Any expenditure which promises to be profitable or reproductive would now be made by private capital, which is seeking in vain fields for a 3- to 6-percent return. There is no need of more good houses to supply a paying demand. Anybody who can pay for a better house can at present find plenty to choose from without need for new construction. Slum clearance and better housing must be a sheer gift to the poor from the State.

DOLES OR WAGES FOR USEFUL WORK?

The question is, Shall we support 15 to 20 million unemployed in idleness or shall we increase total demand for goods and services in a way to receive from these now unemployed a contribution to our available supply of goods and to our permanent social capital? I assume that we are not going to allow the unemployed to starve, or that they will not allow us to let them starve. If these assumptions are correct, it seems idiotic to debate the question whether or not we should have a dole. We have it already. As long as any community supports unemployed and does not allow them to die of starvation that community has a dole system.

SUGGESTED PLAN

The central problem is that of developing and expressing a will to put the unemployed to work. I would offer the following suggestions:

First, the President of the United States should issue a message stating the problem and inviting the governors of the States to send representatives to a special public-expenditures conference to be held at Washington for the purpose of working out the technical details of a long-range program to run for at least 5 years. By the end of that period we should know what further measures, if any, the State would have to take. The object of the conference would be the use by the State of all the resources at its command to bring about at once and maintain indefinitely in the future a sufficient amount of consumption and creation of new capital, whether for social or profit-making purposes, to reduce unemployment to a negligible quantity.

Second, the conference would determine the amounts to be spent by each political entity, i.e., State or large city, over the period of the program. For budgeting these additional public expenditures it would be found desirable, if not absolutely necessary, to merge the expenditures of small entities like towns under 100,000 inhabitants and many counties into large State budgets. The conference would determine the distribution rate per year and objects of the additional expenditures. The geographical distribution of the expenditures would have to be determined somewhat by the respective tax-contributing potentialities of different localities as well as by local needs and preferences. It might be necessary to admit a larger expenditure per capita of inhabitants for New York than for Arkansas, either for slum clearance or social services. Obviously, the plan of the conference would have to be discussed and ratified in the form of appropriate legislation by Congress. And it goes without saying that Congress has not the time or facilities for the technical elaboration of such a plan in its details.

Third. The public-expenditures program would include full provisions for initial credit financing and subsequent taxation coverage of 100 percent of the total outlay each year. These expenditures, as already indicated, would in no sense be commercial, productive, or self-liquidating investments. They would be purely consumptive expenditures.

FINANCING OF A LONG-RANGE PUBLIC-EXPENDITURES PLAN

The initial financing should take the form of an issue by the Federal Reserve Bank System of non-interest-bearing bank-deposit credit to the order of the Treasurer of the United States, who would make all disbursements. The bank money so created by the fiat of the State would be drawn upon by Treasury warrants and transferred to private accounts in commercial banks through the simple process of making Government disbursements. The taxation part of the program would call for heavy income and sales taxes to furnish the full amount spent during the period in which spent, once the initial year's expenditures had been covered by fiat creation of deposit credit with the reserve banks.

FINANCING MUST BE WITHOUT INTEREST CHARGES

The initial creation of credit or purchasing power for the public-expenditures program of the first year should be noninterest bearing. One principle which must emerge vindicated as a result of the experiences of this depression is that no interest should ever be promised or paid on purely consumptive uses of credit. It would be easy, of course, to introduce an old mystification. The Government could issue bonds at, say, 4 percent and make it possible, through the reserve banks, for buyers of these bonds to borrow 100 percent of the face value of a bond at a rate of interest less than that of the Government bond. In this way the pretense of paying interest could be maintained. But it would be a cheap and foolish mystification. Money spent by Government on pure consumption should create no aftermath.

EFFECTS OF INFLATION ON PRICES

What about the inflationary effects on prices? Inasmuch as every cent of money created and spent would be paid out for goods actually produced and used, and inasmuch as there are over 15,000,000 idle men to produce more goods to satisfy demand, there should be no considerable rise in prices as a result of any increase in public spending which did not exceed say $25,000,000,000 a year, the amount the now unemployed could produce if employed. Of course, speculation might drive prices upward if $25,000,000,000 a year of additional Government spending were suddenly ordered. But, if the State immediately announced appropriate taxes on speculative profits, the incentive to buy and take the attendant risks for the rise could be effectively checked and speculative price forcing virtually stopped. With speculative price raising checked by appropriate taxes on speculative profits, there would only be scarcity, such as prevailed during the war, to operate as a price lifter over any considerable period. Certainly if we were to spend twice as much as at present, and to do the additional spending by Government agency, we should not thereby create enough consumption to produce scarcity of any important commodity. The factor which would prevent any sustained price rise would be the production of the now unemployed.

There doubtless would be some price lifting done by psychological reactions to the mystic word "inflation." But what of it? If prices rose to 1929 levels and remained there, most of our present debt problems would be solved. And surely creditors and debtors alike should prefer scaling up income to scaling down debts.

EVILS OF DOLE RELIEF

Schemes of unemployment relief by creating jobs are for the most part economically unsound, politically dangerous, and morally detestable. We do not want to share misfortune or unemployment. We should want to end them as far as possible. Drafting home-loving Americans into labor battalions is an insult to American standards of decency and an assault on our traditions and civilization. It is strange that people should shrink from a recognition by the State of a responsibility to maintain adequate consumption and employment and that, at the same time they should advocate militarized labor for the unemployed. Labor conscripts will furnish the best possible soil for the seeds of communism. To destroy the homelife of the American workingman is to undermine the basis of our civilization.

UNEMPLOYMENT A PROBLEM OF SOCIETY, NOT JUST OF THE UNEMPLOYED

The problem of unemployment is the problem of an entire society which is not consuming enough to employ all of its members. The corrective must be applied to society in the form of increased consumption. If the evil of the entire community is corrected, there will be no unemployed except among those perversely unwilling to work.

SHORTER HOURS NO SOLUTION

All schemes for shortening the hours of labor ignore many fundamental facts. First, it will help no one to share unemployment. Second, there is no reason to suppose that the output of our entire working population working 8 hours a day might not be used to increase the happiness of the people. Third, there is no indication that labor is unwilling to work 7 to 8 hours a day in many occupations.

AGRICULTURE

Thus far I have not mentioned agriculture or the mortgage debtors, either in agriculture or the field of small owners. I should favor special relief to the distressed in any field and at any cost. Nevertheless, I do not believe that merely canceling the debts of the embarrassed debtor will contribute to a restoration of prosperity. Forcing creditors, most of whom spend their interest income, to accept a lower interest income or to lose part of their principal may equalize some of the present misery. But what we want to do is to reduce the total amount of our misery, not just to share it more evenly. There is, unhappily, in this country a pietistic, ascetic, and masochistic sentiment favoring the sharing of misery, unemployment, and a lower standard of living. According to this view, we are now suffering a theological punishment for high living during the boom.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES

With particular regard to the problem of depressed agricultural prices and the uneven terms of present barter of farm products for manufactured goods, it may be said that no general relief can be had from robbing Peter to pay Paul. Taking from miserable bread eaters hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes to give to equally, or even more, miserable wheat growers may equalize misery, but it will not revive trade. The farmers are ill-advised to seek salvation at the expense of other miserable classes.

ONLY INCREASED CONSUMPTION CAN HELP THE FARMER

Only increased consumption of all sorts of goods can ever help the farmer. This generalization was proved in every country during the war when the farmer received a larger real return for his output than ever in history. As for the limitation of farm output, it is evident that only a rise in total consumption can establish a fairer balance. This is true because if people cannot find jobs in industry, they will, of necessity, drift back to the land, there to swell agricultural production and lower the purchasing power of the farmers.

REDISTRIBUTION OF INCOME

The farmers make a mistake to hope for relief from mere redistribution of income through taxation. The very processes of a drastic redistribution of wealth and income would, other things being equal, result in diminished consumption because of the disturbances such processes would produce in our present capitalistic machinery. Of course, a drastic program of increased spending, financed by higher taxes, would effect a much more even distribution of wealth and income. Such a redistribution of income would be tolerable to the most heavily taxed for the good reason that, as a result of additional spending, there would be more produced and more to distribute. High taxes will soon be of no interest to the late rich, because, if present trends continue, there will be no rich to pay income or other high taxes. It is obviously better to have $90 out of $100 income taken by the State in taxes than an income of zero and taxes of the same amount. The first problem of government is not that of redistributing income but increasing income. The trouble with merely redistribution solutions is that they do not undertake first to produce more and then, incidentally, to distribute more evenly.

WHERE SHOULD WE GET THE MONEY?

Where should we get the money for increased Government spending in these days when our money incomes are being progressively reduced? The answer is that we should get the money where we have always got money—where we got money to open up the continent; where we got money to fight our wars, including the biggest in history. George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Woodrow Wilson are not called inflationists because their achievements in our three great wars would have been impossible without inflation. The opening up of this continent is not denounced because it was done with inflation of credit. We should get the money from a stroke of a banker's pen or a turn of a printing press, exactly as every people in the world have always got all the money they ever used except such as they extracted from gold and silver mines. It is not necessary to prove that inflation will work well to establish a case for colossal Government expenditures on credit until such expenditures can be permanently maintained through tax levies. It is necessary only to prove that if inflation by Government spending is not started, we shall soon witness the collapse of our entire civilization.

CONFIDENCE IN MONEY OR CONFIDENCE IN EARNINGS

Those in high places who are preaching these days confidence in our banks and currency fail to recognize that confidence in hoarded money is not confidence in invested capital. Money put into banks these days is, for the most part, not invested but hoarded. It is safe to say, on the basis of analysis of bank statements, that more than 50 cents of every dollar of savings recently put into banks have gone directly or indirectly into the deficit of the Federal, State, or municipal governments or of corporations operating at a net loss. It needs no proving that money loaned to a railroad to keep it out of receivership is not an investment. A Government deficit and the debt it creates are not capital investments. They are in no sense assets, except insofar as it is an asset to individual holders of Government bonds to have a legal claim to a pension from society in the form of interest on a Government bond. Many banks are refusing or discouraging new deposits because they cannot find what they deem safe and profitable uses for loaned money. The need is for confidence to spend and invest; not for confidence to hold on to money symbols written on bank books or paper currency.

A LACK OF CONFIDENCE IN MONEY WOULD CREATE A BUSINESS BOOM

If the people of the country as a whole mistrusted all banks and trusted their currency, they would try to convert their bank deposits into paper currency for the purpose of holding such paper money. It was precisely such a Nation-wide attempt of this sort that brought on the recent bank holiday. The banks have since reopened, that is about three fourths of them. There has been no further flight from bank deposits to paper currency. Paper currency in circulation has consequently declined and bank deposits have about held their own. A flight from paper money to gold has been rendered impossible under the new regulations suspending the convertibility of paper money into gold and making it a crime to own gold coins. It should be remembered that the order of events in a flight from money is, first, a flight from bank money to currency; and, second, a flight from currency to gold. There is also a flight from money to goods which will be discussed farther on. Just at present, we have no flight from money to gold or to goods. It is one of the mysteries of finance why some people are rejoicing over a degree of popular confidence in bank money and currency that amounts to a preference for money rather than goods.

POST-WAR EXPERIENCE WITH INFLATION

It is fortunate that we have much post-war experience to enlighten us about what may be expected in the event of a flight from money. It is comparatively easy to predict many sequels of a Nation-wide flight from a currency. Just such a flight took place in Germany for 3 years. Did it cripple trade? The answer is that it stimulated trade. Not until the quantity of marks in circulation had been expanded several million times their pre-war amount was the point reached in the German inflation that goods and services could not be readily bought with paper marks. At the present moment in the United States the wildest proposals of inflation do not call for a doubling of the total volume of currency and credit. If President Roosevelt had persuaded Congress to print and give away $10,000,000,000 in paper money to the people of the United States, the currency inflation so produced would not have offset the deflation in purchasing power that has resulted in the United States during the past 3 months by reason of the reduction of bank deposits and credit. Whatever may have been the causes of the February run on the banks, no one can say that inflation of bank deposits or bank credit was one of the causes. Deflation and not inflation closes banks and stops the wheels of industry and trade.

GERMAN INFLATION BREAK-DOWN DUE TO TWO FACTORS

The reasons why currency inflation into the trillions resulted in a break-down of trade in paper money in Germany grew mainly out of two special factors. The first factor was the chronic deficit in the international balance of commodity trade of Germany. Germany needs more imports each year than her normal exports will purchase in foreign markets. The excess of imports into Germany during the inflationary period was for a time paid for through large sales, about $2,000,000,000 worth, of German paper marks to foreign optimists. But it is hard to finance anything very long on nothing but optimism, as some people are now learning. The second factor forcing a break-down of trade with paper marks was of a purely mechanical nature. It was a matter of the difficulties of printing and computing astronomical sums in paper money, coupled with the problems of hourly price changes to keep pace with a volume of money rapidly expanding toward infinity and a value of each unit of money rapidly receding toward zero.

THE EVILS OF DEFLATION ARE MORE TERRIBLE THAN THOSE OF INFLATION

Having stated the mechanical difficulties of inflation in geometric progression toward infinity, one must add that during the entire period of the German currency inflation, 1921–24, Germany was much better off in every way than she has been during the past 3 years of comparatively sound money and deepening deflation. At no time during the German inflation of the currency did total unemployment in Germany rise above the million mark. The German unemployed have risen since the establishment of sound money to about 4,000,000 in 1929 and 6,000,000 in 1933. Other figures could be given to show that deflation has inflicted more suffering in Germany than the maddest inflation in history.

The people who utter dire warnings about the tragedies of uncontrolled inflation exaggerate the facts and utterly ignore the tragedies of uncontrolled deflation. A period of uncontrolled inflation culminates when consumption and new creation of capital goods are running ahead of current production. The corrective is simple, obvious, and relatively harmless. The people just slow down until consumption and new building are brought into balance with current production. A period of uncontrolled deflation, on the other hand, such as we are now agonizing in, would eventually culminate in nobody's producing anything whatever for sale. The correctives would be the starvation of everybody but farmers and the production by farmers of everything they used—the end of trade, in other words. This would mean going back to the life of our aborigines. It is evident then that deflation is fraught with graver potentialities of evil than inflation. Inflation leads to a rest. Deflation leads to death. Deflation, if persisted in, will mean the annihilation of our entire industrial population and of our present civilization. Perhaps Spengler is right. Perhaps our civilization must perish. But deflationists should be told what they really advocate when they oppose inflation.

THE GERMAN INFLATION PROVES THAT INFLATION WORKS TO STIMULATE TRADE

I have cited the German inflation, the worst possible example, to prove two points: First, it remains possible during the worst conceivable inflation for trade to go on. Second, inflation stimulates trade to the maximum limit of existing productive capacity. In our case, with a perpetually favorable balance of commodity trade, it is conceivable that we might go on expanding our currency until the price of a postage stamp might be the millionth power of a million dollars. Mechanical difficulties of computation in high numbers and the relative ease of devaluing and starting all over again ever so often would naturally indicate repeated cycles of inflation instead of expansion of the currency to infinity.

UNLIMITED INFLATION, HOWEVER, IS NOT NECESSARY

Here I wish to say that if I point out that inflation accelerates trade, I do not thereby argue that there is no other way of maintaining a satisfactory amount of total trade than to inflate to infinity. We may hope to develop with State spending and higher taxation, heavily implemented with non-interest-bearing public credit, a satisfactory state of trade over an indefinite period.

WHAT ABOUT THE EFFECTS OF INFLATION ON BONDS AND MORTGAGES?

I must first put in a word of reply to those who raise the objection that German inflation wiped out 100 percent of the value of German bonds and that French inflation extinguished 80 percent of the value of French bonds. My answer is: First, the present American deflation will also wipe out 100 percent of the value of bonds and mortgages if not checked by inflation. Better restore railway traffic through inflation and wipe out 50 percent of the purchasing power of railway bonds than allow an abandonment of transportation facilities through the effects of deflation to wipe out 100 percent of the value of railway bonds. Second, limited inflation can save much of the value of bonds and mortgages.

WHAT ABOUT A FLIGHT FROM THE DOLLAR TO FOREIGN CURRENCIES?

It seems unnecessary in the world of today to discuss the problem of a flight of capital from one country to another. International movements of money, credit, and gold are no longer free. The gold standard is suspended in America and England and in most other countries. A flight of American capital abroad is only to be feared by an American Government making an attempt to maintain the gold standard, or the free convertibility and export of gold. Once the American Government makes no pretense at converting paper dollars into gold or allowing gold freely to be exported, attempts at a flight from the dollar to foreign currencies would present difficulties only to those making such attempts, not to the American Government or the American people.

If enough persons were so foolish as to sell a considerable quantity of dollars for foreign currencies in foreign markets, they might produce a low quotation on American dollars. That low rate would discourage American imports of foreign goods and encourage foreign imports of American goods. It would do what our tariff and "Buy American" campaigns aim to do. And it would do what our exporters wish to do—promote American exports. The Americans selling paper dollars in a foreign currency at a rate below the purchasing-power parity of the dollar in the United States would be richly punished for their folly by the loss they would suffer. It may, therefore, be said that the only flight from the dollar which is at all probable in the world of 1933 is a flight from dollars to American goods and investments.

It is important at this point to emphasize the difference between a flight from bank deposits to money and a flight to goods and investments. It is evident that, given existing limitations of law and popular prejudices governing the issue of additional paper money, any large-scale flight from bank deposits to currency must be quickly stopped by a closing of all banks. If the Federal Reserve banks can only issue up to two and a half times as many paper dollars as they hold of gold dollars, and if it is considered scandalous for the State to print paper money not covered by gold, it is clear that the banks of the country cannot possibly obtain enough money to pay off some $40,000,000,000 of deposits at one time. A flight from bank deposits under these conditions must close the banks which could not possibly obtain more than some 25 percent of their deposits in lawful money to pay to depositors.

NATIONALIZATION OF OUR BANKING SYSTEM WHEN IT FAILS UNDER PRIVATE MANAGERS

In parenthesis, I may offer the opinion that the simplest and sanest way for the Government to have met the Nation-wide flight from the dollar in the bank holiday of last March would have been to nationalize at once all banks, start the printing press (which was done), and announce that all banking resources and all banking liabilities would be pooled, the Government offering at once to pay in new paper money 50 cents on every dollar of deposits, pending a new valuation of bank assets, bank deposits, and bank liabilities to creditors. It is assumed that the merging of all bank resources could have allowed the Government, without penalizing the taxpayer, pay at least 50 cents on every dollar of deposits in all banks. Had such a policy been followed, paper money would quickly have started flowing back into the banks, and subsequent runs on the banks of the Nation-operated system would be improbable. This is true, because, once the Government owns and operates all the banks, a deposit dollar is as good as a currency dollar.

POOLING OF BANK ASSETS AND LIABILITIES A DISCRIMINATION? WHAT OF IT?

It may be objected that it would have been discriminatory against the more solvent banks, their owners, creditors, and depositors to have pooled their assets and liabilities, respectively, with those of the weaker and less solvent banks. This is perfectly true, but what of it? We embarked more than a century ago on the policy of economic discrimination by State action. The tariff is an example. The necessity for equalizing by State interference certain legally acquired economic advantages is now fully recognized. The farm-allotment plan and special aid to home-owners threatened with a legal loss of their homes are examples of capital levies on one class and State subsidies to economically crippled groups. Let us have more of the same thing in the interests of equity and prosperity.

THE EASE OF EQUALIZING ECONOMIC ADVANTAGES THROUGH NATIONALIZATION OF BANKS

One of the beauties of equalizing fortunes and economic advantages of different regions and groups through the nationalization of all banks and merging of all financial assets and liabilities is that once the so-called "strong banks" have to close and remain closed until permitted with the aid of the Government printing press to reopen, there can be no valid legal or moral objection to complete nationalization. The good banks get at the Government printing press through the Federal Reserve banks and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. When a bank closes its doors to the public, it opens its doors to the State. When all banks have to close and in utter helplessness admit their inability to meet their obligations all bank managements should be deemed to have abdicated permanently to the State. There is no excuse for private management of banks which fails to operate the banking system in a way to merit and command public confidence and to operate without such measures of State aid as are now being extended.

REDISTRIBUTION THROUGH NATIONALIZATION OF BANKING CANNOT BE EVADED

Another beauty of equalizing fortunes through the nationalization of all banks is that any redistribution of wealth which may be made will operate as a tax on certain favored individuals and communities, and as a tax which cannot be evaded. Bank assets are absolutely at the command of State administrators, once banks have to close and use the Government printing press to reopen.

PRESENT PLANS OF BANK REOPENING GIVE FINANCES OF NATION TO WALL-STREET CONTROL

Under the plan of bank reopenings and reorganizations now in operation or contemplation, the resources of the Government printing press through the Reserve banks and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are being placed at the command of the so-called "sound" banks, most of which are in the favored regions. The banks of New York, in particular, are being rewarded for having sucked up the liquid balances of country banks all over the country during a long depression; for having reduced their loans to productive business enterprises employing labor; and for having put their liquid funds into nearly riskless short-term Government notes; in a word, the "sound" banks are to be rewarded for having hoarded and kept liquid while the banks of the stricken regions of the country have had to stand holding the bag. The banks of the agricultural regions and smaller towns are penalized for having financed the honest but unprofitable enterprise of tilling the soil and feeding the Nation. Now the financial interests of New York and the East are to be allowed, with the aid of Government credit, to obtain a stranglehold on the resources of the country, much as they did after the crash of 1907. This stranglehold of Wall Street on the country will be obtained through the power now being given to the strong to reorganize banks in communities which are now bankless, moneyless, and generally helpless. The strong financial interests will be aided to develop large banking chains, the control of which will be vested in New York interests and pipe profits from the country to that center of wealth and economic power.

GOVERNMENT CAN ALWAYS CHECK A FLIGHT FROM DEPOSITS OR CURRENCY TO GOLD

Resuming the thread of my larger argument, I may say that government can always check a flight from bank deposits to paper currency by making paper currency no better than bank deposits, or by making bank deposits as good as paper currency. Mr. Roosevelt, as yet, has not followed the ideal procedure I have outlined, but he is going far and will go farther in that direction—perhaps more from necessity than inclination. Putting the printing press behind "sound" banks is a radical step towards making some deposits as good as paper money. Suspending the convertibility of paper money into gold is a big step towards making paper money no better than bank deposits. These two types of measures have discouraged further flight from bank deposits to currency or from currency to gold; but they have not encouraged a flight from money to goods or investments.

WE NEED A FLIGHT FROM MONEY TO GOODS AND INVESTMENTS

Those for whom the suggestion of a lack of confidence in money is anathema should consider that turning money into goods does not mean reducing the volume of money or making a run on banks. The explanation is evident. When a person buys goods or an investment with the payment of a bank check, the recipient of the check deposits the money promptly in the same or another bank. Let us suppose that in one day every cent of money on deposit in all American banks were paid out for goods and investments. What would be the situation the next day? Well, for one thing, there would be just as much money in the banks and in circulation. There would be less goods in stock and many securities and pieces of real estate would have changed owners. Prices of securities, real estate, and commodities would have taken a big rise. What events would then probably follow? The answer is that merchants and manufacturers would borrow large sums from the banks, thus increasing the total amount of deposits. This they would do in order to replace the goods just sold. Millions of unemployed would be put to work on wages created by credit advances from the banks. We should find ourselves overnight in the midst of a new business boom just because the depositors in all American banks had suddenly lost confidence in our currency. It must be remembered that putting money into a bank is an act of confidence in the bank, but that this act only helps the general situation if the bank shows equal confidence in the future of the community by putting that money into productive enterprise.

HOW TO STOP A BOOM—PREACH RENEWED CONFIDENCE IN MONEY SO AS TO START HOARDING

If the lack of confidence in deposits and money we have supposed were to continue, with the result that neither producer nor consumer wished to hold money in the bank or in his pocket any longer than he could help, we should soon have all our factories and working people on overtime employment. The pressure on our productive plant and overworked employees might easily become so heavy that the President of the United States would be justified in making an appeal to the patriotism and humanitarianism of the American people to show more confidence in their banks and currency by hoarding money in their banks and purses. Only in this way could industry, agriculture, and trade be given a breathing spell. When such a situation arose, I should hasten to join a society for the restoration of confidence in our banks and currency and for the encouragement of thrift.

A NATION-WIDE LOSS OF CONFIDENCE IN MONEY, HOWEVER, IS MOST UNLIKELY

Such a Nation-wide loss of confidence in our bank deposits and currency as might usher in overnight a new era of prosperity would be a psychological miracle, the like of which no sane person could reasonably expect to see happen. It might seem logical, in the light of present conditions, to exhort the Nation to work this miracle. The trouble, however, is that exhortations are not acted on by the Nation; they are acted on by individuals. Now, it would be silly to advise individuals to turn dollars into goods or investments when it is known that individual incomes from capital are declining to the vanishing point and when it is apparent that investments are yielding less and less. It would be almost criminal to advise workers whose wages have been cut and whose jobs are in jeopardy to spend their savings in the banks. To the unemployed who might still be so fortunate as to have a little money left in the bank or in their pockets, one might say that a national wave of spending would restore prosperity and jobs. Still, one would have to add that a personal spree of spending by the unemployed man of his savings would instantly put him in the bread line. Failure to distinguish between the dictates of expediency for the group and the demands of prudence for the individual is the fault of most advisers on the depression. Another fault is a stupid faith that miracles always happen.

PLEAS FOR CONFIDENCE IN MONEY SUPPOSE A PRE-WAR SITUATION WHICH HAS PASSED

The reasoning which underlies most pleas for more confidence in our banks and currency rests on an imaginary picture of a pre-war situation in our industrial and territorial expansion, already alluded to. The pre-war situation was never quite that of the imaginary picture, but whatever the pre-war situation, it no longer exists. We are not receiving a million immigrants a year; we are losing people by emigration. We no longer have free lands to give away; and if we had them, no one would want them. The theory is that there must be a great demand for loan funds in the world and that the supply of savings for the purchase of bonds and mortgages will normally be inadequate unless people are inspired with confidence in the stability of the unit of currency and in the soundness of financial institutions. The theory has always taken it for granted that borrowers as a whole could earn interest charges and that potential lenders as a whole will never hold funds idle for any length of time. Both of these assumptions are entirely untrue to theory or history.

ONLY FOR SHORT PERIODS HAS IT BEEN POSSIBLE TO EARN INTEREST—PEOPLE HAVE ALWAYS HOARDED

For thousands of years it has been impossible all over the world, in all sorts of civilization, to lend large amounts of money at interest. For thousands of years in all sorts of civilizations rich princes, nobles, and merchants have hoarded gold and other forms of liquid wealth. Columbuses cannot discover Americas every century or so.

THE LENDER'S CHIEF CONCERN IS NOT SOUND MONEY OR SOUND CONTRACTS BUT POSSIBILITY OF EARNING A RETURN

If it is assumed that there are always unlimited fields for the employment of capital at profitable rates of interest, it goes without saying that the lender's chief concern is over the stability of the unit of money in which interest and principal are to be paid, and this concern extends also to the enforceability at law of loan contracts. The trouble with this theory is that the major premise is no longer true. The problem is not stability of the currency or enforceability of loan contracts. The problem is to find a profitable investment. Holders of bonds and mortgages are no longer worried about getting a good dollar or having a valid contract. They are wondering whether they will get anything at all from railroads which cannot earn operating charges. Talk about inspiring confidence in the soundness of banks and the currency is about as silly as giving banks access to the Government printing press and then humbly inquiring whether and on what terms the bankers will be kind enough to lend money to the Government.

Wholesale reductions of principal and interest on existing debts are on the cards. There is not the slightest doubt that creditors must take what is offered them, or what is earned. The implications of these debt reductions are (1) bank deposits must be scaled down in proportion to the general impairment of earnings of capital and labor as a whole; (2) the gold content of the dollar must be correspondingly reduced; (3) the annual savings out of income from capital must be reduced in measure as capital income is being reduced by the current processes of deflation; (4) persons dependent on capital income for living expenses must, in view of net reductions of principal and income, gradually eat up their principal. The capital of purely financial institutions like banks, trust companies, insurance companies, building and loan associations, and so forth, must be gradually dissipated by the same general processes of deflation or business without profit. How absurd then to attempt to revive confidence in new investment or additional spending by telling people the bedtime story that their bank deposits and currency are safe. Moreover, people are not worried about the conservation of money savings so much as they are over the possibility of earning more money with capital or labor. If earnings or production and consumption fail to increase, then neither bank deposits nor currency can be good in their present amount. The dollar cannot be maintained at its present gold content.

MONEY IN BANK DEPOSITS OR CURRENCY IS A SYMBOL—IT IS AS GOOD AS WHAT IS BEHIND IT

The fallacy of the confidence in the bank and currency school of thought is that of supposing that bank deposits and money can ever be anything more than symbols of wealth, or that the symbol can be better than the reality. Bank deposits and currency are but symbols which are useful for effecting exchanges of wealth and uses of wealth. To whatever extent the earnings of factories, railroads, or renting properties are impaired, bank deposits must be reduced. The worth of symbols of wealth must decline as the worth of the wealth declines. If we choose to allow half of the capitalized wealth of the Nation to remain idle and unused, that unused half is not wealth. We must, therefore, write down the capitalization of bank deposits, bonds, mortgages, and insurance policies. Why not write up wealth by using it? Why not write up production and earnings.

CONCLUSION—THE ABSURDITY OF PREACHING CONFIDENCE WITHOUT RAISING CONSUMPTION

It is absurd to preach confidence in bank deposits or currency to people who have the best of reasons to husband their savings and not to create new productive capital. Confidence must be restored in the ability of invested capital to earn a return and of labor to earn a wage. The Budget balancers propose to inspire confidence by throwing Government employees out of work. If there were good grounds for confidence in future earning power of capital and labor, there would be no need to worry about confidence in the solvency of banks or the soundness of the currency. What can be done to restore confidence in the future earning power of America? The answer is that the state must increase the demand for the potential output of American capital and American labor by spending colossal amounts of money on socially desirable expenditures. If we don't do it soon on social expenditures, we shall do it on war.

HITLER, GOERING, GOEBBLER, ET AL., COWARDS AND BULLIES—THE FEDERAL BAR ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK, CONNECTICUT, AND NEW JERSEY PROTESTS THE HITLER OUTRAGES

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on H.R. 24.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call attention to House Resolution 24, which I introduced in the House on March 9, and which is as follows:

Whereas serious antisemitic outbreaks have occurred in Germany under the regime of the chancellor, Adolf Hitler, leader of the Nazis; and

Whereas the oppressions and proscriptions of Jews now practiced in Germany hark back to an age of barbarism; and

Whereas American citizens of Jewish faith have been outraged and insulted, their homes invaded, and their very lives placed in jeopardy; and

Whereas the anti-Jewish action in Germany involves the denial of the fundamental rights of every human being in a spirit contrary to the traditions of American freedom of conscience, religion, and liberty; and

Whereas distinguished Protestant and Catholic laymen and clerics, as well as important religious and interdenominational organizations and societies, have emphatically registered protests against such Nazi policies; and

Whereas the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the B'nai B'rith, and other Jewish philanthropic, humanitarian, and fraternal organizations have asked the American Government to make proper representations to the Government of Germany concerning these anti-Jewish assaults and outrages; and

Whereas there are ample precedents for such action to be taken by our State Department, to wit:

(1) In 1875 our Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish, appointed a Jewish consul general in Bucharest, Mr. Piexotto, solely for the purpose of indicating to the world that we in America were interested in the treatment accorded to the Jews there.

(2) In complete abhorrence of the excesses that had taken place in Rumania again in 1902, John Hay, Secretary of State, forwarded to Rumania his celebrated note, wherein he said:

The United States "cannot be a tacit party to such an international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Rumania are subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself, but in the name of humanity."

(3) In 1928, as a result of mass meetings protesting the violation of minority rights by Rumania, our Secretary of State Kellogg represented to the Rumanian Government that we viewed with concern the outrages perpetrated there and that we would view with great disfavor a continuance thereof; and

Whereas this diplomatic interference by our Government in each case brought the required relief; and

Whereas the rights of American citizens are involved: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives in Congress assembled deems it fitting and proper for our State Department, provided it be compatible with the public interest, to make known to the German Government that it does not view with favor the cunning cruelties, outrages, and insults now practiced against our nationals who are Jews now domiciled in Germany; and be it further

Resolved, That our Government in the name of humanity calls upon the German Government to cease denying the fundamental and inalienable rights of those who may be resident in Germany, be they Jew or non-Jew.

I have not pressed this resolution for passage, nor have I demanded a hearing thereon before the Foreign Affairs Committee. I have refrained from taking these steps because of the assurance given by our distinguished Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, our former colleague, that he had the matter well in hand and that he could, by moral suasion rather than by forceful protests, ameliorate the conditions now confronting the Jews in Germany. Our distinguished colleague, SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, likewise urged caution. I respected and still respect his advice, and in accordance therewith I have not breeched what to him and to our State Department are the proprieties.

Under date of March 26, 1933, Secretary of State Cordell Hull made the following public statement:

I feel hopeful, in view of the reported attitude of high German officials and the evidences of amelioration already indicated, that the situation which has caused such widespread concern throughout this country will soon revert to normal. Meanwhile, I shall continue to watch the situation closely with a sympathetic interest and with a desire to be helpful in whatever way possible.

However, in the light of present conditions, apparently the situation has not returned to normal and is not improving. Recent events in Germany seem to indicate that Chancellor Hitler has not moderated his zeal against Jews and things Jewish. He may not be murdering the Jews, but he is undoubtedly killing them economically and starving them into submission. His is a sort of cold pogrom of economic strangulation. Sad to relate, his Nazi drive on Jews is being carried beyond the Reich. There are repercussions far beyond Germany's borders, and anti-Semitism is rearing its foul head in other countries. The promise that I and some of my colleagues have given to Secretary of State Hull may have to be withdrawn soon unless there are changes for the better in Germany, and we shall be compelled to use every weapon in the legislative arsenal to help put an end to the acts of these cowards and cravens—Hitler, Goering, Goebbler, and others.

I herewith insert, first, a letter which I addressed to the president of the American Olympic Committee, Mr. Avery Brundage, of Chicago, under date of April 20, and, second, a communication which I addressed to Maj. William Kennelly, president of the New York Athletic Club, under date of April 12.

APRIL 20, 1933.

Mr. AVERY BRUNDAGE,
President American Olympic Committee,
Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. BRUNDAGE: The Olympic games are scheduled to be held in Germany in 1936. The unsportsmanlike attitude of the Nazi toward Jewish athletes renders this meet unthinkable. Germany cannot be considered a land of fair sport when men are proscribed because of a question of race or religion.

Dr. Theodore Lewald, chairman of the Olympic games for 1936, scheduled to be held in Berlin, has been forced to resign because his father was born of Jewish parents 120 years ago. Dr. Lewald was the chief organizer of the German sports movement for youth. He was recently removed as chairman of the German Sports Federation because of being one fourth Jewish.

Hitler, Goering, Goebbler, et al., cowards and bullies, by their unspeakable attitude have made it impossible to expect that American athletes, especially if they be Jewish, will receive fair consideration.

Certainly the Olympics—the very essence of racial equality—should not be held in a country that bans runners, hurdlers, wrestlers, and tennis players simply because they are Jews. Sporting America would be craven should no protest be made, and this can be done by refusing to send our teams to Germany. No red-blooded American should go to these games if they are to be held in Germany.

Every effort should immediately be directed toward the transfer of these games from Germany elsewhere. Otherwise, by our inaction, we condone these insane and brutal German discriminations.

Respectfully yours,

EMANUEL CELLER,
Representative Tenth New York District.

APRIL 12, 1933.

Maj. WILLIAM KENNELLY,
President New York Athletic Club,
Seventh Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR PRESIDENT KENNELLY: I am informed that Dr. Daniel Prenn, one of Germany's best tennis players, has been dropped from the German Davis Cup team competition because he is a Jew.

Theodore Lewald is about to resign from the chairmanship of the German Sports Federation as a result of Nazi pressure because he is one quarter Jewish.

These are but additional instances of the insane and brutal attitude of the Hitlerites toward the Jews.

To fair-minded Americans this is indeed a blow below the belt and befouls the very name of sportsmanship.

I am wondering what will be the answer of athletic America to this amazing insult to sporting intelligence and this unspeakable violation of the traditions of fair play.

Not the least extraordinary aspect of the removal of these two sportsmen is the fact that the announcement is made on the eve of the arrival of Max Schmeling, the German pugilist, who is about to embark for the United States to engage in a fistic combat with none other than the Jewish boxer, Max Baer, at the Yankee Stadium in New York City. The said Schmeling plans to make a tour of the United States that will take him into 42 cities. On one of his previous visits to this country he earned over half a million dollars, which he took back with him to Germany. He, of course, expects to extract from the sporting element of our country a similar sum during his forthcoming trip.

Recently, this same Schmeling was shown in the talkies with Adolf Hitler, and therein Hitler extolled Schmeling and expressed the hope that young Germany would emulate him.

We all know what would happen if the situation were reversed and a Jewish prize fighter like Max Rosenblum or Max Baer were scheduled to enter the prize ring in Germany against Max Schmeling. What would be the reception accorded the Jewish prize fighter? Would he be permitted even to enter Germany, let alone the prize ring?

What shall be the attitude of sporting America concerning the visit of this German pugilist?

Yours sincerely,

EMANUEL CELLER,
Representative Tenth New York District.

PROTEST OF THE FEDERAL BAR ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK, CONNECTICUT, AND NEW JERSEY

On April 17, 1933, at the Hotel Commodore in New York City, there was held a meeting of the Federal Bar Association of New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, at which a resolution, introduced by Mr. Hugh Gordon Miller and seconded by Mr. John Eubank, Mr. Benjamin Hartstein, and others, was passed by a unanimous rising vote.

These distinguished lawyers have the following to say concerning the persecution of their brother lawyers in Germany, simply because they happen to have been born Jews or to have one fourth Jewish blood in their veins.

It is interesting to note that Mr. MILLER, in presenting the resolution, stated that no Jew had suggested it or had anything whatsoever to do with it; that it was a Gentile demand for justice to fellow lawyers of the Jewish race in Germany, a token of fraternal regard and loyalty, in the face of a situation the contemplation of which was enough to sicken and revolt the soul of any human being not gone mad.

The ruthless cruelty of the persecution was unequaled even in medieval times. Driven, without any process of law whatsoever, not only from the bench to which they were constitutionally elevated, but from the practice of their profession, these brother lawyers are deprived of their money, penalized for not keeping up their law establishments, and kept imprisoned in Germany facing distress, slow starvation, and privation for themselves and their children. The Jewish race and faith have furnished many of the greatest lawyers, law givers, and judges that mankind has known, and it cannot, therefore, in the light of all recorded history, be claimed, even as an excuse, that these persecutors are dealing with a backward race.

On account of these well-established facts—regardless of any physical atrocities—the Federal Bar Association of New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey desires to go on record as not only viewing such uncivilized conduct toward members of the legal profession with the deepest horror and condemnation, but expressing public sympathy to them, and calling upon all believers in human justice throughout the world to publicly condemn the indefensible course taken by the present administration of the government of Germany.

This position is the same as that expressed by the British Foreign Secretary in the House of Commons on April 13, namely, that—

This is not a Jewish outlook or the outlook of a section or party. It is an Anglo-Saxon outlook.

It would be a profound mistake for anyone to imagine the feeling in this country is limited to members of the Jewish community.

It is a spontaneous expression of the principle of racial toleration.

It is believed that this protest and appeal to the true German culture, in the name of humanity and justice, as practiced in all ages by civilized people, will be heeded when inflamed passions subside, and our concern is that ordered justice may again be established by this great nation.

Knowing, nevertheless, that the present party of Hitler has declared its intention to carry out such a persecution, it is impossible in the name of humanity to remain silent while it is being put into effect, regardless of any camouflage for foreign consumption.

It is therefore resolved that there can be no fraternal intercourse between the members of the Federal bar of New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, and the bar of any nation, so long as they permit or encourage such persecution because of race or religion; that any fraternal invitations from the bar of the United States to the bar of Germany in connection with the coming Chicago Exposition, or any other invitation to the bar of Germany which calls for fraternal intercourse, be at once recalled unless the German Government immediately orders a stop to these persecutions.

Blind justice in this matter, covering her face in horror, cries out in an appeal to the court of last resort, a court which in the last analysis is final, the collective judgment of mankind, which is moulded to a large extent by the bar. Let this resolution be the answer so far as this association is concerned.

Jewish brains do not enrage their Anglo-Saxon brothers in America certainly, and apparently not in Great Britain. Thank God, Anglo-Saxon lawyers have inherited a sporting sense, along with the traditions of liberty and justice.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after consideration and disposition of the so-called "gasoline tax bill" it may be in order to take up for consideration the bill (H.R. 4606) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes; that all points of order may be considered as waived, and that general debate shall be confined to the bill and shall continue for 2 hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like a little further explanation in regard to this situation. In the first place, as I understand the program, the gasoline tax bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee, will be taken up today and will probably consume the entire day. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee then desires to ask unanimous consent to take up what is known as the "Wagner bill", granting a gift of $500,000,000 to the different States?

Mr. BYRNS. That is the bill I referred to.

Mr. SNELL. And that consideration of that bill may immediately follow the gasoline bill, which will probably be tomorrow. Is that the situation?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. I do not know just how long the gasoline bill will require.

Mr. SNELL. But to immediately follow it, but not to be taken up today?

Mr. BYRNS. Well, if the gentleman insists that it go over until tomorrow, I would not object. I can see no reason why, if the gasoline bill should be considered at an early hour, we could not go on with the general debate and then take it up under the 5-minute rule tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. I understand there is to be 3 hours' general debate on the gasoline tax bill, and if that is true, that will consume most of today.

Mr. BYRNS. I am entirely willing to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from New York and take up the Wagner bill tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, there are some of us opposed to that bill, but I am not going to take the position of opposing consideration. As I understand the gentleman's request, it is simply to consider the bill under the general rules of the House?

Mr. BYRNS. That will be the effect of my request, if granted.

Mr. SNELL. If it is agreeable to the ranking members on our side as to the time for general debate—and I suppose it is or the gentleman would not have asked it—it will be agreeable to me.

Mr. BYRNS. Well, I have not consulted with the ranking minority members.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would leave the question of 2 hours' general debate open until tomorrow. At the present time the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] do not appear to be on the floor. Otherwise I would not have any objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. BYRNS. I am willing to withdraw that portion of my request with reference to the limitation on general debate, but this is a bill which is fashioned along the lines of the bill which was passed for the aid of agriculture. It has been in committee now for 10 days or 2 weeks. If we are going to pass the bill, it should be passed quickly, and I can see no reason for any extended debate on the subject, especially when immediately after this we will have the Muscle Shoals bill, to be followed with either the securities bill or the home owners' mortgage bill and a resolution which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will bring in relating to the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. SNELL. I have no desire to bring in extraneous matters under general debate, and I am willing to have the debate limited to the bill itself, and perhaps 2 hours will be sufficient time; but before I agree to that, I feel I should consult with the ranking members on our committee. Otherwise I have no objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw from my request the limitation upon the time for general debate.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. A remark has been made that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] are absent. I happen to know they are engaged on very important business in committee at this time, and that is the reason they are not present at this moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] asks unanimous consent that immediately following the consideration of the bill H.R. 5040 it shall be in order to consider the bill H.R. 4606, the Wagner bill, and that all points of order shall be considered as waived. Is there objection?

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, is it the gentleman's request that debate on the next bill be limited to 3 hours?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I am not asking that.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman is not going to have 3 hours' debate on the gasoline tax bill, is he?

Mr. BYRNS. I did not ask that.

Mr. FULLER. The time for general debate on the next bill is left open?

Mr. BYRNS. That is left open.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, the matter of time for general debate will be taken out at the outset of the consideration of the bill tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman fom Tennessee?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL AID FOR STATE AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting therein a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, and that the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
STATE OF DELAWARE.

House Concurrent Resolution 27

We hereby certify that the enclosed is the same house concurrent resolution as was passed in regular session by both houses of the one hundred and fourth general assembly.

J. THOMAS ROBINSON,
Speaker of the House.
W. A. SIMONTON,
President Pro Tempore of the Senate.

We hereby certify that the enclosed house concurrent resolution is properly backed, stamped, and sealed, and is the same house concurrent resolution as above certified to.

OWEN K. MOORE,
Bill Clerk of the House.
KARLENE H. CARPENTER,
Bill Clerk of the Senate.

Certified with—

EDWIN E. SHALLCION,
Clerk of the House.
WM. P. SHORT,
Secretary of the Senate.

House Concurrent Resolution 27

Whereas the Congress of the United States has authorized the President to revise all appropriations for the operation of the Federal Government; and

Whereas information has been received that in such revisions there is a possibility that all Federal aid to the States be discontinued; and

Whereas if such Federal aid were discontinued such action would seriously impair, and possibly eliminate, some important functions of State government in the State of Delaware; and

Whereas these said functions are of vital concern to the agriculture of the State of Delaware inasmuch as elimination of all Federal aid for experiment stations would probably cause the closing of the agricultural experiment station of the State of Delaware, elimination of Federal aid for cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics would cause the disintegration of that work, the elimination of Federal grants for education in agriculture and mechanic arts would probably result in the abolishment of the school of agriculture in the University of Delaware, and elimination of all Federal grants for vocational agriculture would seriously cripple the vocational-school work in the State; and

Whereas the agricultural population would be deprived of all assistance, guidance, and instruction in their farming operations at a time when such assistance, guidance, and instruction are of paramount importance to their welfare; and

Whereas the State of Delaware is financially unable to replace Federal grants in aid by State funds: Be it

Resolved, That we, the General Assembly of the State of Delaware, do hereby petition and implore Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, that complete elimination of Federal grants to States for teaching, research, and extension work in agriculture do not take place. We petition that the President of the United States give serious consideration to the fact that abolishment of all Federal grants to the States might result in destroying the school of agriculture of the University of Delaware and the cessation of all its functions, including research, experimentation, extension work, and collegiate instruction in the science and art of agriculture and that the elimination of aid from the school of agriculture of the University of Delaware would work an undue hardship upon farmers and the agricultural industry of Delaware.

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Delaware.

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX—MODIFICATION OF POSTAGE RATES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this bill be limited to two hours and a half to be equally divided and controlled, one half by myself and one half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH]. This is in accordance with a tentative understanding I have with these gentlemen.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the time allotted is entirely satisfactory to this side. My only suggestion to the gentleman from North Carolina is that he couple with his request the statement that the general debate shall be confined to the bill. I did not understand him to make that as part of his request.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request accordingly and ask that general debate be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, with Mr. HASTINGS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, section 2 of this bill relates to rates of postage. Certain rates of postage are definitely fixed in the bill. Other rates are left to the determination of the President of the United States to be modified as he may deem advisable during the next fiscal year. The authority contained in this bill expires on July 1, 1934.

This bill sets out to reduce, as an experiment, the rate of first-class postage on letters delivered locally in the city in which they are mailed. This is what is known as drop letter postage. For example, a letter mailed in the city of Washington for delivery in the city of Washington, the rate on which is now 3 cents, will under this bill be 2 cents; but a letter mailed in Washington for delivery in Baltimore will take the 3-cent postage rate until such time as the President deems it advisable to reduce the rate to 2 cents. It may be this rate will not be reduced, but the President has the power to do so if he deems it expedient.

It is my idea that the rate of postage on first-class matter should be 2 cents per ounce all over the United States so far as letter mail is concerned. When the matter was brought to the attention of the House Post Office Committee in the Seventy-second Congress our committee opposed the increase from 2 cents to 3 cents. However, when the sales tax was defeated in the House at that session it was necessary for the Committee on Ways and Means to find other sources of revenue, and this postage increase was recommended by that committee. The department at that time estimated the revenues resulting from the increase of postage from 2 cents to 3 cents would amount to $134,000,000 annually.

At that time I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and opposed increasing the postage rates from 2 cents to 3 cents. The bill was brought before the House and, again, I opposed the increase and my opposition was based on my knowledge of postal rates and because of the past experiences of the Department, which indicated to me that no such revenues would be raised. On the other hand, I maintained that wide-spread evasion would take place all over the United States, resulting in a loss of revenue rather than the increase which the Department expected.

When this bill was brought to the attention of the members of our committee this year, consistent with the action we had taken in the past, we urged a general reduction from 3 cents to 2 cents for all first-class letter mail. The bill, as you know, was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and properly so, because the increase was in the nature of a tax, rather than an increase of postage rates.

A conference was recently called at the Post Office Department, and the distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and myself attended. The experts of the Department contended that if we returned to the 2 cent rate we might lose approximately $70,000,000 and that this would result in great injury to a balanced postal budget. They suggested that if we reduced the rate on local mail from 3 cents to 2 cents the loss would only amount to $17,000,000. The result of this conference, attended by representatives of the House and Senate and the Post Office Department, was this compromise measure.

The Postmaster General himself, eager to bring about such reductions as would be consistent at this time, agreed that for experimental purposes it would be proper to reduce the rate on first-class postage in the local post-office districts from 3 cents to 2 cents, and if this proved successful the general reduction for which we contended would be made.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does not the gentleman think it will tend to confusion in the large mailing houses in the sending out of their mail? They will have to have additional clerks to segregate the local and the out-of-town mail. I think it would be better if the matter were made uniform.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct; it would work more satisfactorily, and, in my judgment, it would yield more revenue. It would increase the volume, and as you increase the volume you reduce the unit cost. But as I have said, this is a compromise measure, and it is now up to those of us who have contended that the 2-cent rate will yield more revenue to prove our contention, and if that occurs there is ample authority granted in the bill to carry out the suggestion which the gentleman has made.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. As I understand it, first-class mail now pays a profit over and above the cost of operation of something like $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 a year. The greatest source of loss in the Postal Service is from second-class mail. Is there any provision in this bill that gives the President authority to readjust the rates on second-class mail so as to make that class of mail pay something like the cost of operatiton?

Mr. MEAD. As I understand the bill, we not only grant the President such authority as will permit him to modify first-class rates but we also grant him authority during the next fiscal year to modify such other rates as he may deem necessary in order to make the service pay.

Mr. ARNOLD. Is that authority carried in this bill with reference to second- and third- and fourth-class mail matter?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; it is carried in the bill with respect to all classes of mail, but there is a definite requirement that first-class mail in the local post offices be reduced to 2 cents.

Mr. ARNOLD. I think that is a very good field of operation.

Mr. MEAD. Very good.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, the gentleman and his committee have been making quite an exhaustive study for the last year or so relative to postal rates. From the statement the gentleman has made on the floor of the House, and from reported statements in the newspapers by the present Postmaster General, I thought you were all agreed that you should change at once the 3-cent rate on first-class mail to 2 cents. Am I correct about this?

Mr. MEAD. So far as I am concerned, the gentleman is correct. The only argument that was made against a general reduction was by the experts of the Post Office Department, who contended that we would disturb a balanced postal budget; that we would incur a loss of $70,000,000 if we followed the suggestions which the gentleman has just offered.

Mr. SNELL. Who is it that has any more definite information than the committee that has been studying this matter for the last year or so?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the distinguished minority leader that about a year ago the Post Office Department presented figures to the Ways and Means Committee indicating we would increase our revenues by $134,000,000, and, unfortunately for the present administration, the same experts that presented those figures are now presenting figures to vindicate the stand they took at that time.

Mr. SNELL. But, as I understand, facts and experience have proven to the gentlemen that their figures are not correct.

Mr. MEAD. I am in thorough accord with the gentleman; I believe their figures are not correct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. If proof has come to the gentleman's committee that their facts and contentions are not true, and the gentleman has made up his mind that we should reduce the first-class postage rate to 2 cents, and I am informed the Postmaster General—at least from the interviews he has given—feels the same way about it——

Mr. MEAD. He is very sympathetic toward our position.

Mr. SNELL. Then why should we not do that now? As far as I know, the majority of this House, from all the indications I have seen, want to do it; and if we believe it is right and want to do it, why should we not do it now?

Mr. MEAD. As I said before, I believe the statement of the minority leader to be correct, but the contention put forth by the experts of the Department prevented our doing just what you would have us do. This bill is a compromise. This permits the reduction to take place, and the process is a safe one from every standpoint. If the contentions you and I make are correct, then the President may reduce first-class postage universally throughout the United States. If such a provision were not in the bill, I would oppose it. I am sure it will be proven that 2-cent postage is justified, even from a revenue standpoint.

Mr. SNELL. Who is responsible to the people of the United States for legislation, the Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate or the experts in the Department, when the gentleman himself says he does not place confidence in the report they have made, and as the gentleman says it has been proved by experience that the reports were not true?

Mr. MEAD. As I have stated, we are delegating certain powers to the Executive branch of the Government. If I remember correctly, when the economy bill was being considered on the floor of the House, my distinguished friend, who now objects to delegating power to the Executive, voted to delegate the greater authority contained in that measure to the President. I opposed it, so I am as consistent as he is.

Mr. SNELL. Not a bit; the other was an emergency proposition, and that is the reason I voted for the measure. This is not an emergency proposition and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. MEAD. I will say that balancing the Budget under these difficult conditions and trying times is an emergency matter. As I said before, the experts of the Department disagreed with our figures and are trying to vindicate the estimates they gave out when postage rates were increased.

Mr. SNELL. Who is opposing what the gentleman thinks we ought to do here today?

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman from New York knows better than I do how legislation is prepared and considered in these emergency days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. MEAD. Now, I want to give you a few figures in relation to the increased postage. In 1931, according to the Department estimate, first-class mail produced $335,000,000.

In 1932 the first-class mail produced $310,000,000, or a decrease of $25,000,000, or approximately 8 percent, which was due to the depression. If the 8 percent decrease continued for 1933, the first-class mail would produce $286,000,000, considering the normal depression drop; but that was not the case. In 1932 we carried 13,000,000,000 letters, and in 1933 there were 5,200,000,000 letters less left in the first-class mail. Five billion two hundred million at 2 cents amounts to over $100,000,000 in revenue. The total first-class pieces left in the mail amounted to 7,800,000,000, and at 3 cents each would amount to $234,000,000, instead of $286,000,000, the normal depression drop. If we will add to that the post-card revenues of $14,000,000, we have $248,000,000, and we are still suffering a loss of $38,000,000 on first-class mail, due to the increased rate. Therefore, considering only first-class mail and deducting the normal loss due to economic conditions, including revenue received from post cards, we made a mistake when we increased postage from 2 to 3 cents. This bill should pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I propose to offer a motion to recommit this bill and strike out all matter relating to postage rates and to eliminate the granting to the President the power to change postal rates. I think that the Congress is thoroughly qualified to act in a matter of that kind on its own responsibility.

The statement was made in the committee yesterday that this is an emergency measure. I should like some Member to tell me how and why this is an emergency measure. I differ with the Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. He did not vote for the President's economy measure, and yet he comes up here and tells us how important it is for us to support the President at this time. I did vote for the economy bill, and I have always voted to give the President full power to act when there is a real emergency requiring the exercise of such power. But if we are going to grant the President this power in respect to all measures and become "rubber-stamp" Congressmen, "me too" Congressmen, why not let us take a recess for such time as it may require the President to complete his program, and when he sends down his bills we can pass them en bloc by rubber-stamping our approval of them? In all my 19 years' experience in Congress I have never heard or seen a gasoline tax bill being mixed up with a proposition to reduce postage rates.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a fact that the fixing of postal rates is somewhat like the fixing of railroad rates, a technical matter, and that those who are in daily contact and charge of it, studying the matter day in and day out, are in better position to know what rates are just and equitable than are those of us who merely superficially study it?

Mr. BACHARACH. I think one of the most efficient committees in the House is the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] did not complete entirely his statement on this subject, because he neglected to make the statement which he made before the Ways and Means Committee a year ago, that an increase in the rate on post cards would not bring in the revenue anticipated. He was correct in that, and the Post Office Department was wrong, just as he is correct today, when he says that the uniform rate should be 2 cents on first-class mail matter.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In order to ask the gentleman from New Jersey this question in connection with the inquiry of the chairman of the committee: Did not the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], introduce a bill that undertook to establish a flat reduction to 2 cents under date of March 17? What became of that bill? There never were any hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on the original bill which the gentleman introduced.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. In response to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, the ranking member of the committee, I did introduce a bill to provide for a 2-cent rate; but before presenting that measure—appropriately, I think—I discussed the matter with the Treasury Department and with the Post Office Department, with the Postmaster General and with the Secretary of the Treasury, and also with the President of the United States. While they were all sympathetic with the purpose in view, to return to a flat 2-cent rate on first-class mail matter, yet at the same time they were so anxious to balance the Budget without increasing taxes or levying additional taxes that until a survey could be made and it could be ascertained definitely whether or not there would be any substantial loss in revenue as a result of the return to the 2-cent rate, that at their request I deferred to their judgment in order that the matter might be tried out, first, on a flat 2-cent rate on local matter, drop letters, and then, if it works, as I understand it will, and as we all hope it will, the President will have the authority to apply it to all first-class mail.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the time of the gentleman from New Jersey unduly, but evidently the chairman of the committee admits that in his own judgment the original bill which he introduced, and which never had a hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means, represented his judgment. Later on that judgment was side-tracked in behalf of other people's judgment. That is about the situation here today.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In that connection I might suggest that the judgment of the administration at this time in not coming down on first-class mail to a 2-cent rate is the same as the judgment of the ex-President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, and the judgment of Mr. Ogden L. Mills, former Secretary of the Treasury, who recommended that the rates be increased from 2 cents to 3 cents.

Mr. BACHARACH. I hope the gentleman does not take all of my time.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. With only 6 weeks of the new administration the gentleman should not be so critical.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. My time is getting short.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey has there ever been a time that any administration official, until the present day, recommended an optional postal rate?

Mr. BACHARACH. Never to my knowledge.

Yesterday we had before us in executive session an employee of the Post Office Department to testify in favor of this bill. He stated the reason the administration wanted to reduce the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents was because they were losing the business of public-utility companies, department stores, and other large business organizations. He stated that these people were sending out bills and other communications by messengers. They wish to get back that business for the Post Office Department, and it was thought that this could be done by reducing the rate on local drop letters. But it is hardly likely that these concerns would scrap their messenger services for a 1-cent saving on local first-class matter when it would still be necessary for them to pay 3 cents on letters to contiguous territory. If we are going to reduce the rate to 2 cents on first-class matter, let us make it uniform throughout the country. That is the only way this matter should be handled as far as first-class mail is concerned.

I also want to call attention to what has been said about second-class mail and the contention that second-class mail is not paying its fair share. I am not quite so sure it is not paying its fair share. The rate was increased last year, after quite extended hearings, and it was brought back to the rate of 1920. The reason I say I am not so sure that it is not paying its fair share is because we know that it is the general practice for public utilities to make special rates covering slack periods; for instance, the gas company in Washington gives reduced rates for daytime usage; electric companies do the same thing. The telegraph companies have four different special-rate services, all of which cost identically the same for them to operate. Why do they do that? They do it to use the slack time. That is exactly what occurs with second-class mail.

The paramount thing that is considered by the Post Office Department is getting out first-class mail, and that is done with express speed. I could quote Postmaster General Brown in support of this and I could quote from the testimony which Mr. MEAD gave before our committee a year ago in public hearings. Mr. MEAD contended the reason the post-office business was falling off was because of the business depression, and that instead of increasing in the normal amount of $30,000,000 a year, it was falling off by reason of the falling-off in business.

It is nothing short of ridiculous to grant such powers to the President of the United States. I do not care if he is a Republican or a Democrat. It is a direct slap in the face, as far as the Members of this House are concerned. I have been sent here by my constituents to legislate, and not to delegate that power to someone else. As I said before, there is no one who knows more about post-office matters than the gentlemen who represent the minority and majority on the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. Let them consider the question of increased postage and report their findings to the Congress.

We can go too far in delegating the power that belongs alone to Congress. I was here during the war days, and I voted for every measure that President Wilson asked for to win the war, as did the Republican minority generally. We know that when it came to the passage of the selective draft bill President Wilson could not get the Democratic chairman of the Military Affairs Committee to handle it, and he asked that great American, the late Julius Kahn, the ranking minority member, to handle the bill. There are many here who know that story.

So I say to you, as far as the Republicans are concerned they are willing to go along; but when it comes to a proposition of mixing up postage rates with a gasoline tax and granting extraordinary powers to the President, it should not be done. I know the gentleman is going to say the only reason that it is asked is to save time, but we could pass the gas-tax bill in 5 minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a fact that the increase of postage and the imposition of the gas tax were included in the same bill?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes; and there were 20 other articles in that bill, too; but the only reason that it is put in this bill, in my judgment, is to drag along this proposition to give new powers to the President, because everyone is in favor of a continuation of the 1-cent gasoline tax for another year and there would be no opposition to it.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman believe that under his plan the post-office business would be put on a self-supporting basis?

Mr. BACHARACH. The first-class mail probably would.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. I understand the gentleman expects to make a motion to recommit the bill, to strike out two different sections?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. One of those sections is to not give to the President any discretionary power with reference to the 2-cent rate.

Mr. BACHARACH. That is true.

Mr. JENKINS. Does the gentleman contemplate in his motion also keeping from the President or not giving to the President the right to do anything with reference to the second-class mail?

Mr. BACHARACH. Absolutely. That is up to the House.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. I think the gentleman has made a statement that he might clarify, namely, that under the gentleman's plan we could balance the Post Office budget. I do not think the gentleman meant to say that.

Mr. BACHARACH. Oh, no, no; and I did not say that. I had reference to the deficit on first-class mail.

Mr. RAGON. We will balance the Budget any way we figure it on first-class mail, because every schoolboy knows that first-class mail is a profitable proposition.

Mr. BACHARACH. I want to ask the gentleman a question, if I may.

Mr. RAGON. Very well.

Mr. BACHARACH. Does the gentleman believe this is the proper way to legislate on Post Office matters? If so, why not let us delegate all our powers to the Executive and quit?

Mr. RAGON. Does the gentleman from New Jersey wish me to answer?

Mr. BACHARACH. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will answer.

Mr. RAGON. I think the gentleman should take the position he took in the committee. I cannot justify my vote making it possible for the President of the United States to take away from ex-service men crippled and maimed the hundreds of millions of dollars we have granted them by sitting here supinely and permitting the newspapers of this country, for instance, to enjoy a practical subsidy of $102,000,000 in postal advantages.

Mr. BACHARACH. The amount is all right but the gentleman has not stated all the facts.

Mr. RAGON. I state frankly that that is what the expert from the Treasury Department told us yesterday. Now, if authority is given the officials of the Post Office Department working under the President to work out a system to take care of the deficit on second-class mail, they can balance the postal budget.

Mr. BACHARACH. Is the gentleman talking for the White House now?

Mr. RAGON. No; I am speaking for myself personally.

Mr. BACHARACH. Does the gentleman know if the President proposes to change the rates or does he merely want the power?

Mr. RAGON. Does the gentleman suppose his Secretary of the Treasury and his Postmaster General would object?

Mr. BACHARACH. This is what concerns us Republicans——

Mr. RAGON. It is just plain, ordinary horse sense, my friend knows as well as I do.

Mr. BACHARACH. No. I think I understand, but I still do not see and the gentleman cannot make me see that we are going to lose $102,000,000.

Mr. RAGON. No; but the gentleman heard what the expert from the Treasury said yesterday. The gentleman knows, and I know, that we never had the intestinal fortitude in this House to stand up and adjust these postal rates. Now, I am in favor of trying it.

Mr. BACHARACH. I have but a minute left. I hope the gentleman will let me proceed.

Mr. RAGON. I am sure the gentleman can get more time. I think the gentleman will agree with me that we cannot do it in the House and we cannot do it in the Senate. Now, let us give a chance to someone who will do it.

Mr. BACHARACH. I say to the gentleman, as I said before, as far as my constituents are concerned they did not send me here to be a rubber stamp. They sent me here to legislate.

Mr. RAGON. Did the gentleman act as a rubber stamp when he voted on the economy bill?

Mr. BACHARACH. I voted for it because it was an emergency measure.

Mr. RAGON. It was a rubber-stamp proposition.

Mr. BACHARACH. But it was really an emergency measure. At any rate I considered it as such when I voted for it. But no one can tell me at this time that the question of adjusting postage rates calls for emergency treatment. If that can be proved to my satisfaction then I will go along with the proponents of this bill.

Mr. RAGON. I think I can do it.

Mr. BACHARACH. I know the gentleman will not try it.

Mr. RAGON. I will a little later.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman believe that if this bill is enacted into law the President will take cognizance of the fact there is a deficit in the second- and third-class postage rates and regulate these rates?

Mr. BACHARACH. Of course, we all know there is a deficit in second- and third-class mail receipts, and the Congress can handle the matter just as well as the President. It is fallacious to talk about newspapers being entirely responsible for this deficit. Not more than 18 percent of the circulation of the newspapers of the country is carried by mail. So this 18 percent is not the controlling factor in this proposition. Our Democratic brethren simply want these powers delegated to the President; why they do, is a matter upon which you may draw your own conclusions; I have my own.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We voted for the economy bill as an emergency measure because there was a tremendous deficit. Part of the deficit, at least to the extent of $100,000,000, came from the Post Office Department. We are going to take care of this part of the deficit. Is not this an emergency matter?

Mr. BACHARACH. No. I understand we have had a falling off of postal receipts; and, of course, last year we did have a deficit, but I fail to see why this cannot be corrected by the Congress, instead of delegating that power to the President.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. As I view it, it really is part of our emergency program to take care of this deficit of $100,000,000, and we are going to give the President the power to take care of it.

Mr. BACHARACH. The Congress has the power, and if we cannot exercise it honestly and conscientiously we should be retired from Congress. I took my full share of responsibility on the veterans' bill as I expect to take it on every measure.

Mr. Chairman, we are not sent here to delegate all our powers to the President of the United States. I agree with the gentleman from Nebraska that in an extreme emergency we should delegate certain powers to the President, but this is no more an emergency matter than any other routine bill that comes before the House for consideration from day to day.

I hope those who agree with me will support the motion to recommit.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman's motion is to recommit the bill for the purpose of eliminating sections 2 and 3?

Mr. BACHARACH. Yes; the bill to be reported back forthwith, and the gasoline tax continued.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman feel that it is also part of the President's emergency program to continue efforts to balance the Budget and that this bill is an effort in this direction?

Mr. BACHARACH. I do not know how the gentleman can say that, when we are soon to give to the States $500,000,000 for relief purposes, and when we are spending another $300,000,000 for reforestation. We cannot hope to balance the Budget through our efforts to raise revenue if we are going to continue to spend money by hundred millions at a time.

This bill should be voted down; it should be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report forthwith that part of the bill bearing upon the extension of the gasoline tax. The remainder of the bill should be sent to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, where it properly belongs. If it is the wisdom and judgment of that committee that we should reduce the rate on first-class mail matter and perhaps increase the rates on other matter, let the committee so recommend and let the Congress consider the proposition on its merits.

The Congress in the past has solved more important issues without delegating its powers to the President of the United States. In my opinion it is a terrible indictment of lack of courage and leadership for this Congress to admit, as we will admit if this bill becomes a law, that we are unable to solve so small a question as that involved in a change in our postal rates.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is much difference in the opinions of Members of the House with reference to the propriety of passing this bill when the simple purpose behind it is understood.

In the first place the bill carries a continuation of the gasoline tax for another year.

I was very much surprised that my friend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] came here and made the speech to include in the postal revenues the 2-cent rate on all first-class matter when his fight in the committee was made to add a cent to the gasoline tax. I do not know his purpose and his strategy here now. If he can carry his point here, why did he make his fight in the committee yesterday to add another cent to the gasoline tax? The facts are we are forced to continue this gasoline tax for another year.

It brings in about $138,000,000. I am one who would like to see this tax removed as soon as we can. In the first place, I think it invades a field of taxation that has been preempted by the States, and, in the second place, I think we should, as soon as we can, make a sharp line of demarcation between the two fields of taxation, the one in which the Federal Government should have priority and the one in which the States should have priority; but it is necessary to continue this tax. So much for this.

Now, coming down to the postal rates, the President or the administration asked for two things, first, that we give him authority to adjust postal rates so as to bring about, as much as possible, a parity in the different classes in order to make them pay for the services they get through the Post Office Department, and suggests also that we could make a reduction in the rate on drop letters. This means that for the patrons of a particular post office you may make a reduction to 2 cents. If you will read the bill, you will find the President cannot alter this particular feature of it. Upon investigation, under the authority we give him in this bill, he may reduce all first-class matter to 2 cents, if he sees fit.

It seems to me this is as plain as reasonable and prudent men would ask, and it is child's play for anyone to stand up here and tell you that first-class mail is not a profitable thing for the Government.

We found in the conference with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ballantine, and the other experts down there that there is a dispute between the different factions as to how much the present 3-cent postal rate brings in. It is the best opinion of the Treasury that it has paid and that it will continue to pay, but, Mr. Chairman, here is the particular feature that I want to discuss that my friend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] brought up a moment ago.

The present deficit in the Post Office Department is a staggering amount of money. I have just concluded the statement that first-class matter contributes a profit to the Government. Therefore these other classes of mail are the ones that are a burden upon the Government of the United States. It has been submitted to us, why should the services of the Post Office Department be given to certain classes of people or certain industries in this country at a loss to the taxpayers of the country, and this has been going on for years and years, as is well known to many Members of the House, if not to all of them.

I cannot agree that my good friend from New Jersey, for whom I have the greatest affection, is altogether sincere in his fight here, because he was one of the men who marched up with the strongest determination for the economy bill, and why did he do it? He thought there were inequities in the compensations and the hospitalization of the ex-service men.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. In just a moment.

He thought if we in Congress here could not readjust these matters—and I am going to go further than he did and say that we would not have readjusted them—then we should give the power to someone in the administrative department that would not be susceptible, or subjected, I should say more properly perhaps, to the pressure that is brought to bear in such matters, and that he would go ahead and equitably reduce and readjust the compensations to the ex-service men.

My friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, was entirely willing and ready to go down the line for what has proven to be a great personal sacrifice to many ex-service men in this country. I went down the line with him on the same theory, because I knew, and my friend knows, that you could not readjust in this House the compensation of these ex-service men in 100 years because of the pressure.

All right, now what do we have? As I suggested in answer to the gentleman's question, we have a subsidy—and I am not a carping critic of the press of this country—that amounts to around $100,000,000, which the experts in the Post Office Department told us yesterday amounts to an advantage for the newspapers and magazines of this country which is not enjoyed by the private citizen of the country in the matter of postal rates.

Now, I think we should put Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego all in the same rank and if we can treat one in this way, we should treat all others the same way.

I do not know that the authorities will increase these rates so as to make the second-class mail service self-sustaining, but I do say that from the information we get from the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department, there are virtual subsidies, there are bonuses, if you please, being given to industries in this country that are users of the mail that should stop and should stop now.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BACHARACH. The Democratic Party is a party that occasionally has a caucus, and it seems to me, if the gentleman is so much interested in taxing the newspapers and the magazines and thinks that $102,000,000 of the deficit should be charged to second-class mail, all he would have to do would be to hold a caucus and get his party committed to increasing such rates, and there would not be any question about its passing the House. Why does not the gentleman do that? That would be a short cut, and then we would know exactly what we were voting on.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman from New Jersey is entirely too practical a business man, too practical a politician, to ask me such a question, save and except for my embarrassment; but I want to suggest to him this much: I have no brief for or against the newspapers. I used them as an illustration; but I would suggest to the Members of this House that whenever someone undertakes down at the Post Office Department to even up these things, I say, give strength to his arm. That is exactly what we are trying to do under this bill.

I think all this debate and fuss is making a mountain out of a molehill. I do not think that this bill ought to take more than 20 minutes in debate; but for some reason or other my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from New York evidently feel that they might get a little political advantage out of it, and insist on an extended debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Who has received any assurance and by whom has the assurance been given that second-class mail rates or other rates will be increased when the optional power is given to the President? We have heard rumors that if the President lowered the 3-cent rate eventually he is going to raise other rates. Who has gone to him or the Postmaster General and got that assurance?

Mr. RAGON. I am surprised that my friend from Massachusetts asks a question like that. Why should the bill ask for that power if someone did not intend to use it? That answers the gentleman completely, and I think the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of our committee, has suggested that he had conferred with the Department of the Treasury and also the Post Office Department and that this bill was the outgrowth of their suggestions.

Mr. TREADWAY. It may be the outgrowth of that but who promised the chairman of the committee that he would raise the rate?

Mr. RAGON. Why should we ask for it if it is not to be used?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is what we want to know.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman from Massachusetts will remember that we asked for the authority in the case of hospitalization of the veterans and nobody asked the question then, and why should it be asked now?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It goes with the power to reduce the first-class rates.

Mr. RAGON. Along with the power to reduce the first-class mail generally to 2 cents he has authority to reduce on other classes of mail; and if he finds that it should be done, it will be done quickly and expeditiously.

It occurs to me that this is one of the most constructive suggestions ever made, for the simple reason that we have now the results of maladjustment of mail rates in the Post Office Department. If we eliminate the local mail from 3 cents to 2 cents, and after investigation it becomes necessary, they can reduce the entire first-class mail to 2 cents. In the meantime, if the second-class mail privileges are being used for advantageous purposes and is not paying its proper share for the service, then the President will be enabled under this act to bring it up to where it will be paying for the service.

I think it is a sound suggestion, and I think, as the gentleman from North Carolina has suggested, he has used extra caution in going into the matter. He has gone to the Treasury Department and the Post Office Department, and this is the combined judgment of those Departments, as well as the Ways and Means Committee, that this bill should be passed. I hope gentlemen will not permit any sprags to be thrown into the wheels in the way of those little matters that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] has brought up.

Of course, if Republican leaders can get this, that is a victory, and that is about all they care for. I do not think there is the worth of a snap of your finger in his entire suggestion. I believe frankly that we should support this measure just as it is. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] regrets that we are taking 20 minutes for the discussion of this bill, a bill which overthrows the traditional policy of the United States for 150 years. The Post Office Department concerns directly every man, woman, and child in the Nation. Many Presidents have referred to the Postal Service in their messages to Congress, but not one of them ever suggested that Congress should abdicate its authority under the Constitution and put the power in the Executive to write postage rates up or down, as he may desire. Never before has such a suggestion as this been presented. Why is it presented now? There is no need for action that cannot be taken in the regular course of procedure. The Post Office Committee of this House, headed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], a splendid Democratic member, has been working on the question of postal rates and has come to the conclusion, I think I may say unanimously, that the putting into effect of a 3-cent postage rate on first-class mail matter was a blunder, which should be corrected without a day's delay. Why are we not doing it here and now? Why is not there a measure before us to reduce that rate and restore the revenues lost to the Department by decreased volume? There can be no doubt about the results of this high rate.

We had in 1932 about 13,000,000,000 letters paying the first-class rate. At the rate they have been dropping in the months already gone, we will lose 5,000,000,000 of those pieces in 1933. At 2 cents each, that amounts to $100,000,000 loss; and if we credit the remaining letters at 3 cents, we will still have a loss in the first-class revenue of between $38,000,000 and $50,000,000. That must be admitted by anyone who has made a study of these rates. All through our history we have found out that every time we have raised the postal rates we have cut the volume, and every time we have reduced the first-class rate we have increased the volume and have increased revenues. There is no reason for saying that the Post Office Committee is not able to meet this situation. We would be here with a unanimous report today if we had the power to make it, but under the 50-percent tax clause in the emergency tax bill it is impossible for the committee charged with these postal rates to bring in such a bill. As a result, the Committee on Ways and Means comes in not with a straight reduction, such as was suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] when he introduced such a bill recently.

This proposal provides that the 2-cent rate on local letters shall be put into force, and that then the President may in his wisdom later on reduce the rate to 2 cents universally. Mr. Chairman, there is only one thing that we ought to do, and that is to strike out section 2 of this bill, and insert a repeal of the 50-percent tax, and bring the rate back to 2 cents where it should be. [Applause.] I feel certain that there would not be 10 votes in this House against that amendment if it were considered on its merits.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like the gentleman to discuss his attitude on the second-class mail.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the only question involved here. There is a provision in the bill which gives the President of the United States the right to modify, up or down, the second-, third-, and fourth-class rates. Take the second-class rates. We have heard a good deal about them. They cover publications, newspapers, and magazines of all kinds. Congress has deliberately fixed the policy of giving all religious, labor, fraternal, and charitable papers in this country a rate of 1½ cents a pound, regardless of distance they are carried.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Not now. That rate is admittedly a losing rate, and everyone knows it. We are losing $16,000,000 a year by that policy. We also have another policy since 1851 whereby newspapers in the counties may use the mails without charge where there is no delivery system. We send them without a charge, and that takes $10,000,000 out of the Treasury in that item alone. In other words, there is $26,000,000 involved in those two items. Does anyone here who talks about the second-class mail matter offer a bill to stop those two classes from having these preferential rates? If he desires to do so, he can save $26,000,000 a year. There is a great deal of talk about loss on the great magazines. It is admitted by the Department that every publication that goes into the mail weighing 8 ounces or more not only pays its own way but a profit to the Government besides. So you may take it as a fact such publications are now paying a rate which is a profitable rate. That means that this entire loss is on the smaller publications that go into the second class. Some of them weigh 150 to the pound, and they have to be distributed in the post office and delivered by the letter carriers at a very high cost.

Mr. Chairman, the easiest way to end this controversy is to put a little proviso in the law providing that 3 cents shall be the minimum charge on any paper circulated in the mail. That will drive out two thirds of the second-class pieces. It will not prevent the deficit being practically as high as it is at the present time, because these second-, third-, and fourth-class matters are supplementary items and the overhead expense continues. This must be figured on an out-of-pocket basis, and therefore the right to modify these rates will find many vexing matters brought to the President of the United States which he will have to decide. This Congress has not been afraid of the second-class rates. We have made a jig-saw puzzle out of them in the last 10 years by repeated action. I have gone through three of these general revisions as a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. We have raised the rates. Then we have lost the mails and have lowered the rates again by force of necessity. In the Revenue Act of 1917 we put 4 raises on second class. It began in 1919, and in 1920 there was an increase, in 1921 another increase, and in 1922 the rates went up to the high point. There was a schedule of eight zones for newspapers, and the rates held until 1925 when it became necessary to make some changes. Why? Because, while every class of mail matter was increasing, second class dropped 20,000,000 pounds between 1920 and 1925.

We wrote a new schedule in 1925, and it was still higher than the Post Office Department would support. The Post Office Department came in in 1928 and recommended a decrease in the second-class rates if we would keep the volume in the mails. In the general revision of 1928 we brought the rates back again to where they were in 1921, exactly the same schedule. Then the tax bill of 1932 put the second-class rates back to where they were in 1922. We have taken up the schedule again, so here we are, playing a game of jig-saw with the Post Office Committee knowing the situation, but it is to be put into other hands, and the same thing will be gone through again. We will have uncertainty in the rates. There is no one in the President's office to tell him about postal rates. The same man who tells him has been at the call of the Post Office Committee. They will have to show him a set of figures based on present conditions. I say there is no necessity for putting this power into the hands of the Executive, under the conditions.

Now, let us look at third class. That is circular mail, billions of pieces, sent out by direct-mail advertisers. We tried to raise that rate, too. We put it up to 1½ cents for 2 ounces, instead of 1 cent, and the first year we lost a billion pieces out of the mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] has expired.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. We put 50 percent on that third-class rate, and the result was that the decrease in volume meant a loss in revenues beyond what we could possibly save. The Department came in and asked us to make that rate so that it might be 1 cent, where they send 12 identical pieces within the pound. Is the President going to increase the third-class rate? He is not. He is not going to get any advice from postal experts as to increasing that rate.

Now, with regard to fourth-class mail, the parcel post, which is interesting to every dweller in rural communities: Under the present law the Postmaster General can go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask for an increase in those rates. He did that last October, and he got the increase. The Interstate Commerce Commission officially stated that all they could consider was a cost ascertainment of the Post Office Department, and therefore they put a blanket O.K. on what the Postmaster General requested. Why is it necessary now that the President have power within himself? If he desires to ask for an increase, let his Postmaster General go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get the increase. Why does he not do it? He will not ask for any further increase in the parcel post.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Can the Interstate Commerce Commission grant authority to the President at the present time, without further legislation, authorizing the raising or lowering of the rates?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But the President would have that authority if this bill were enacted?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The President would act directly; yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Why does the gentleman endorse giving authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission and not to the President?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I do not endorse it. I voted for the bill to take that power away from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Why would it make conditions any worse for the President to get his information from the Post Office Department than from the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Why should there be any such action? If the Executive is afraid of the committees of Congress and of Congress itself, he can go to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am opposed to that power, but it is in the law. In the last session we did not get time to consider its repeal, although it passed the Senate and was favorably reported by the House Committee.

No; there is no emergency need for this bill. There is no reason why we should abdicate our congressional functions by this measure. I admit the President has a constitutional duty to inform the Congress as to what he thinks should be done for the good of the Union. He has no constitutional duty to ask Congress to surrender the power with which we are charged under the Constitution—that is, the power of legislation dealing with these executive departments, such as the Post Office Department. The only thing the President will have before him is a cost ascertainment, which every Postmaster General since it was begun has said could not be used in making rates. Before the Appropriations Committee Mr. Wood, of Indiana, asked General Brown about this cost ascertainment, and this is what he said:

I have thrown overboard the figures on this cost ascertainment. I do not think they are of any value. I think they are just of interest.

Mr. Chairman, when the first cost ascertainment came in in 1923, I read every table in it, and I endeavored at that time to analyze it. I pointed out on this floor that it was built on false premises and that it was valueless in its conclusions and had no basis as a rate-making report. That statement has been borne out by every Postmaster General since that time. The rate revisions we have made had to be made, without regard to that cost ascertainment.

The so-called "profit" on first-class and the so-called "loss" in second, third, and fourth class are not there. They are treated exactly the same. A parcel-post package is charged with the same cost as a letter that goes in expedited treatment, through the Railway Mail Service, and therefore the result of that kind of cost ascertainment and the apportionment of costs on any such basis is bound to be misleading. They have not been and they cannot be accepted as a basis for rate-making purposes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in his view there was no loss in the carriage of second, third, and fourth class of mail matter?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No. I said there is no such loss as this cost ascertainment shows. For instance, a loss of some $32,000,000 is shown on parcel post in 1932.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not think the loss is that great?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; it is not. The apportionment of costs is not right. I think that is what is wrong with the whole cost formula.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And likewise in respect of second-class and third-class mail matter?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes. The profit has been put on first-class mail matter, which is a highly specialized fast service handled by the Railway Mail Service and speeded up to the highest degree. Why should first-class mail matter be considered on the same cost basis as parcel post, which is held sometimes as much as 24 hours to wait for a car? As a result of this inaccurate system the cost ascertainment cannot be used as a basis for rate making.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he thinks the proper cost-ascertainment method is not the policy pursued by the predecessors of the present Postmaster General?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I do, and I am sure after study the gentleman will reach this conclusion, too. The last Postmaster General tried to accept this cost ascertainment as infallible, but he could not do it. It is like a railroad company taking a car of sand or coal and a car of fine watches or automobiles and saying that the cost of carrying the watches or automobiles is exactly the same as the cost of carrying the sand or the coal and that the same rate should be paid on each. It cannot be done by the railroad company, and we cannot do it in the Post Office Department. The idea that we must turn this whole complex matter over to one individual, that we must depend on some one individual in the Post Office Department, is the wrong policy; it is a grave mistake. We should honestly face our responsibility and meet these rate questions as they arise.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has given wide study to postal matters, he does not agree with the position taken by the former Postmaster General, Mr. Brown, relative to the revenue derived from these various classifications of mail matter.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I do not agree with the cost ascertainment as a basis for rate making.

Mr. DOUGHTON. These matters were referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The Interstate Commerce Commission declared they could not enter into an investigation of parcel-post rates, and they did not go into an investigation. The Post Office Department showed they were losing on parcel post, according to the cost ascertainment. Therefore, the Interstate Commerce Commission granted an increase of rates which it was said would produce $7,500,000 additional revenue. They allowed an increase in the size of parcels which could be carried, and this increased size was expected to yield $5,000,000 additional revenue, making a total expected increase of $12,500,000. Not $1 of this expected increase is reflected in the mail receipts today, and will not be.

Mr. DOUGHTON. As I understand the gentleman he said a moment ago that if the President wanted information he could go to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I now understand the gentleman to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no time to go into a study of questions of this kind.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said the Postmaster General has the power under the law to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman asked why he did not go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am just stating that the Postmaster General did get rates which it was said would bring in additional revenue of $12,500,000 to the Department. Not $1 of this has come in and not $1 of it will come in because the rates are so high the revenue is falling off. This is the difficulty of putting into the hands of any one individual matters which require the experience of years. We have learned by experience, in Congress, and we can profit by it. I see post cards are exempted from this bill; the President cannot deal with post cards. We had a sad experience with post cards and perhaps the same sad experience will follow other rate changes now. The Department told us in 1925 that if we would put a 2-cent rate on the penny post card we would get $10,000,000 additional revenue to add to the $10,000,000 we already had. We therefore put the rate on post cards up to 2 cents and the result was that we lost $6,000,000 of the $10,000,000 we already were getting from this source.

Why should there be this continued uncertainty from experimentation, Mr. Chairman? Why should we as the Congress, House and Senate, be forced to say we cannot deal with this question but must turn it over to the Executive? Let us act in the light of actual experience. It is an unjustified assumption that we are afraid to deal with these problems. It is easy enough to say that politically we are afraid of these vital questions, but it is not the fact.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It is a mistake to let the public feel that Congress does not dare deal with questions like this. I see cartoons in the newspapers about the franking privilege as though we are afraid to deal with it and as though it is the cause of the deficit in the Post Office Department. The fact of the matter is that mail sent out under the congressional franking privilege amounts to less than one tenth of 1 percent of the expenditures of the Post Office Department. There is much misunderstanding about it. Why should we not let the truth be known? Why should we not say that we have dealt with these controversial rates like the second-class rates?

We need postage rates to increase the volume of mail and thus increase our revenues without additional proportional cost. That is what we need to do, and nobody can do it as well as the Congress of the United States. The President is not going to increase second-class rates. The President is not going to increase third-class rates. The President is not going to increase fourth-class rates. He will learn from the experience of these experts in the Department that generally increasing rates above the present point simply means loss of revenue, a greater deficit, and the destruction of service.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman whether he was consulted by the Executive in the writing and preparation of this bill; and did he get any assurance that the Executive expected to raise second-class rates?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Well, I was not taken into consultation by anyone charged with responsibility for this bill, but I do know enough from long experience that no one individual can properly make these general rate revisions. I do know that it is simply going to mean uncertainty for every business man in the United States. The business men will never know what this modification power means until the change comes. They will never know what to plan in the way of a campaign for mail advertising to boost business in time of depression. They will never know what to expect, because, behold, here stands a blanket authority given to the Executive to modify any postage rate. Such power endangers the entire rate structure of the Postal Service.

Mr. Chairman, I hope when the proposal is made to strike out section 2 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof section 2 of the bill introduced on March 17 by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], with wisdom and with understanding, and which repeals the 50-percent tax and puts back the old rate of 2 cents, we will have a majority which will really be expressive of what we believe, and that we will write into this bill a straight-out reduction to 2 cents. Such action will give encouragement to every mail user in the United States, and give them assurance that Congress wants to help them and not hurt them; that we want to help their efforts to increase business and not discourage them, and that we are going to give them the old rate which was in force since 1885, and under which our Nation has expanded until we are the greatest mail-using country in all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman has made a wonderful speech and to sum it up in one word, is there any emergency feature whatever in this bill?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Not the slightest. All we need to do to meet the emergency need is to put the rate back to 2 cents, which we can do by one vote on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Is there anything in connection with this measure that would indicate the President has access to any information that we cannot get here?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Of course, he has not access to any information that is not in the committees of the House and the Senate. He cannot possibly have any chance to acquaint himself with the facts in the case. If he acts on these other rates, he will take the word of some one in the Department who will bring him a set of figures and he will act on them and perhaps injure business all over this country without intending it at all. Then he will change it again and in the meantime there is created uncertainty and unrest in the country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite fortunate, indeed, we have had an opportunity to hear the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], a man who has given many years of distinguished service to a study of postal matters. I want to address myself a moment to his Republican brethren, suggesting that he tell you, with the knowledge he has acquired, based upon his experience of many years, that a proper cost ascertainment has not been made by previous departments. He says such proper cost ascertainment will preclude any increase in second-, third-, or fourth-class postage rates. Now, who on his side of the aisle will say that he is wrong? What other Member on this side of the aisle has had the experience in matters of this character that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has had? He tells you, without equivocation and without hesitation, that the cost ascertainment now used is wrong, as affecting second-, third-, and fourth-class rates.

The power granted in this bill is not power alone to increase rates but is power to modify rates. Within this power you have the power to decrease rates just the same as you do to increase them. And if a proper study justifies it, I say to you that it is the reasonable thing to expect a reduction in second-, third-, and fourth-class postage rates instead of an increase. Congress cannot make a proper cost ascertainment. The Postmaster General must do that. Then he will act accordingly.

In regard to the question asked by my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], whether or not this is an emergency matter, the language of the bill is quite clear on that. Undoubtedly, we are in an emergency. We were in an emergency when President Hoover, through the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, recommended to the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress an increase in first-class postage rates from 2 to 3 cents. We were in the emergency then. This increase from 2 to 3 cents on first-class postage was voted by the committee and by the House because of the existence of this emergency, in order that the Budget for the fiscal year 1933 would be balanced. The Treasury and Post Office Departments recommended this and said it would bring a yield of some $150,000,000 additional revenue. Now, the same emergency continues. They had 10 years in which to make the studies upon which they based the recommendation to increase the postage rate from 2 to 3 cents.

The same emergency now continues. We have a Democratic administration that has been in power 6 weeks. They are endeavoring in part to undo in this bill the grievous error—I am using the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—of the past administration.

Some say—and the press carries the news—that the increase in the rate on first-class mail from 2 to 3 cents has not brought in as much money as was brought in when the rate was 2 cents. This is an error. The Post Office Department gives us the figures in dollars and cents.

I realize that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, as well as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], has reached a conclusion that the revenues have been decreased, but he reached this conclusion in dealing with the volume of postal matter. This is not the proper method. The proper criterion is dollars and cents. The testimony before our committee showed beyond a doubt that the 3-cent rate on first-class mail will bring at least $77,000,000 more into the Treasury than would have come in if the old rate of 2 cents had been in vogue.

The expert from the Department, Mr. Wood, gave us the actual figures for 9 months and the estimated figures for the remaining 3 months of the fiscal year. The actual figures for 9 months and the estimated figures for April, May, and June of the fiscal year show the increase on nonlocal first-class mail for the fiscal year 1933 over 1932 is $60,000,000, and that the increase on local first-class mail for the estimated period is $17,000,000, or a total of $77,000,000 in increased revenues.

Now, the emergency continues, and it is just as necessary to balance the Budget of 1934 as it was to balance the Budget of 1933. So this bill here provides that we will enter upon a period of experimentation and will reduce the local first-class postal rates to 2 cents. And what are local deliveries? It is mail matter emanating from a city or village that is delivered in that city or village; or on a rural route emanating from such village or city, where the delivery is to be made in such village or city, or from a route originating in said city or village.

Now, referring again to the query of the gentleman from Ohio, with reference to whether or not this is an emergency matter, I call attention under section 2, and ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to look that section over. The power granted the President must be exercised during the period ending June 30, 1934, and such power that he exercises in the modification of any postal rates ceases and the rate ceases on July 1, 1934.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I shall be glad to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would not the gentleman add that the 3-cent rate expires on July 1, 1934, anyway?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is true. The 3-cent rate expires July 1, 1934. But what we want to do is to get the benefit in the reduced rate between now and then. We want some results now. We want to give the Department time to get their breath so that they may reach some proper conclusion as to all these rates.

I want to say that this is an emergency. The increase came in as a matter of emergency. They wanted to increase the postal rates. It came in to help balance the Budget. It was recommended by Mr. Hoover and Mr. Ogden Mills and the Ways and Means Committee, and the Congress of the United States took it.

If the bill becomes law, you get the benefit of a reduction on local delivery. I dare say, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, you will get a reduction in postal rates, not only on first-class nonlocal delivery but likewise on second-, third-, and fourth-class matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have listened with great interest to what the gentleman has to say. He realizes that the Post Office Department for 30 years has been trying to solve the question now before the House. But I want to ask the gentleman, who comprises the brain trust which surrounds the President and is going to correct by a miraculous change these rates, that is going to reduce the various rates and still avoid a deficit?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is very hard to give the gentleman an affirmative answer, we have such a quantity of experts and brains; but there is one thing that I can tell the gentleman. It will not be constituted with Mr. Herbert Hoover, Mr. Andrew Mellon, Mr. Ogden Mills, or Mr. Eugene Meyer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRITTEN. But who does constitute this brain trust which in a few days, as the gentleman says, might reduce these rates?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I did not say "within a few days." The gentleman says that. This is what I have in mind, that the very experts upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] relied are the experts in the Post Office Department. The President and the present Postmaster General have been down there only about 6 weeks. My thought is that these experts may have given Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania the "low-down" on a proper cost ascertainment, and if they convey that same information to the present Postmaster General and the President of the United States, they will put into effect a proper, fair, reasonable postal rate based on that proper cost ascertainment.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman then is of opinion that the same advisory council in the Post Office Department which advised President Hoover and President Coolidge and President Harding will now give the same advice to the present President of the United States, and that upon that advice he will reduce the rates?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would not say just the same crowd—I hope not; or, if there are some of the same crowd, I hope that they may be reinforced by other expert minds. There is a different atmosphere down in the Post Office Department, in the Executive Chambers, and in the whole United States since President Roosevelt has come into power.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In just a minute. I submit that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] has not been making idle, wild statements in respect to proper postal rates on second-, third-, and fourth-class mail. The wonder to me is that with the view that he has, which he so forcefully expressed, he has not joined with us in getting this immediate relief, in a reduction in the postage on local delivery, and then trust to the experts and to the fairness of the Executive in this emergency matter, to get the relief that he seeks and which he thinks the country needs in the other rates.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman be good enough to yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman appears to be in complete discord with his colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], who has just stated to the House that the very purpose of bringing this legislation before the House is to increase the second-class rates. The gentleman contends the reverse. How does he reconcile his position?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that I believe that a proper study will be made of the cost of carrying the mail, and I believe that when that study is made it may show that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] knows what he is talking about. It is easy to take figures and juggle them, and they have certainly had some jugglers down there in the executive departments for the past 12 years.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As far as I know, we generally consider the Postmaster General the highest authority as far as postal matters are concerned. It seems to me that the next man whose opinion should be weighed with care is the chairman of the Post Office Committee. Both these gentlemen have said that in their judgment the revenues of the Post Office Department will be increased immediately by adopting 2-cent postage. If this is an emergency matter, and we are practically agreed upon that, why should we not do it today?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, my good friend, JIM MEAD, who is a distinguished and able student of these matters, dealt with quantity, volume of mail, and not dollars.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, I should like the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I shall be glad to do it. For the months of April, May, and June in 1932, as compared to April, May, and June of 1931, when you had 2-cent postage, there was a decrease in the first-class postal revenues of an average of $4,710,000 a month. April 1932 over April 1931, $4,476,000; May 1932 over May 1931, $5,218,000; June 1932 over June 1931, $4,436,000.

Comparing the 9 months' period in which the 3-cent rate was effective, from July 1932 to April 1933, with the comparable period of the 9 months' period from July 1931 to April 1932, during which we had the 2-cent rate, the average monthly decline in first-class postal receipts was only $923,000. The expert from the Treasury gave us actual figures for this comparison. The figures are:

July 1932 (3-cent rate), as compared with July 1931 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $786,000.

August 1932 (3-cent rate), as compared with August 1931 (2-cent rate), an increase of $464,000.

September 1932 (3-cent rate), as compared with September 1931 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $564,000.

October 1932 (3-cent rate), as compared with October 1931 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $1,906,000.

November 1932 (3-cent rate), as compared with November 1931 (2-cent rate), an increase of $753,000.

December 1932 (3-cent rate), as compared with December 1931 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $1,868,000.

January 1933 (3-cent rate), as compared with January 1932 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $638,000.

February 1933 (3-cent rate), as compared with February 1932 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $1,501,000.

March 1933 (3-cent rate), as compared with March 1932 (2-cent rate), a decrease of $2,254,000.

The average decline for this 9 months' period is $923,000 per month over the comparable month, as against an average decline in the 3 months next preceding the effective date of 3-cent postage, which average was, as stated, $4,710,000 over the comparable month in the preceding year.

There can be no question about these figures. With the actual yield of 9 months in this present fiscal year, and with the estimated yield for the remaining 3 months on nonlocal first-class postage there is an increased yield of $60,000,000, and on local first-class postage there is an increased yield of $17,000,000. Those are the best figures that the Post Office Department can give. These figures demonstrate conclusively that more revenue has been received from 3-cent postage than would have been if 2-cent postage had been in effect.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has not yet answered my question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] in their figuring on volume did not divide up the first-class postage into nonlocal and local postage.

Mr. SNELL. I am basing my conclusions upon the statement of the Postmaster General and on the chairman of this committee.

They both say that in their opinion you will increase the revenues of the Post Office by decreasing the first-class postage from 3 cents to 2 cents. If that is true, let us do it today, here and now.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not know when the gentleman heard the Postmaster General say that as affecting nonlocal mail.

Mr. SNELL. I read his statement, and it gave me that impression.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I read his statement, too. It may have given that impression to the gentleman, but it did not give that impression to me with reference to nonlocal delivery.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman contend that the Postmaster General is against 2-cent postage?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not. I will say the statement which I read as emanating from him did not say that which it impressed the gentleman as saying. I feel certain the Postmaster General wants to proceed with care in order to be fair to all classes of mail.

Mr. SNELL. He gave that out, in my judgment, to give the people of the United States to understand he was for 2-cent postage.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And he is today sponsoring 2-cent postage for local mail. We are now endeavoring to give 2-cent postage for local-delivery mail.

Mr. SNELL. If he is for it, let us do it here and now.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We are endeavoring to give the power to the President of the United States to give 2-cent postage on nonlocal delivery as soon as it can be done.

There is one other question in regard to this bill, and that is a committee amendment that will be proposed affecting refunds and credits on Federal tax paid by States. I might simply say that this amendment liberalizes the question of credits and refunds and permits the small dealer, in articles that are sold to a State, a political subdivision of a State, or employees of such State or subdivision, the right to a refund. At the present time small dealers do not have that opportunity. This gives it to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have been much interested in the discussion by our Democratic friends, because the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], an able member of our committee, has given the clearly expressed purpose of this bill to raise the cost of second-, third-, and fourth-class mail by giving the President power to raise those rates so that daily papers, now carried at a loss of $36,000,000, and other mail at an aggregate loss of two hundred million, as shown by the table for 1932, here inserted, may be raised to balance the postal budget.

The gentleman who just addressed you, Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, also a member of our committee and of the majority party, puts an opposite construction upon the purposes of the bill by claiming that the President will further lower these rates and thus increase the loss. Both arguments, with different purposes stated, are to give the President legislative power over postal rates, heretofore possessed by Congress, for the emergency period. The question we have to determine is how to removed a $200,000,000 deficit, counting air mail, which now goes with the 1932 postal bill. I believe that is the purpose in giving the President this control of postal rates at this time. Here is the statement received yesterday by our committee from the Post Office Department:

Postal receipts and expenditures, fiscal year 1932

I call attention to the last column and item affected as reported by the Post Office Department, for it is easy to learn where the great loss occurs and none comes from first-class mail, apart from air mail.

When the increase on first-class letter mail was voted from 2 cents to 3 cents, I opposed that increase, which the two best postal experts in the House, Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania and Chairman MEAD, of the Post Office Committee, both agree was a mistake and did not increase receipts because of decreased amount of letter mail that followed. This bill gives the President power over outside first-class mail retained at 3 cents and also over other mail rates but excepts local letters that alone are reduced to 2 cents.

To show the fallacy of the argument just presented in differentiating between local and outside first-class mail, and with all due respect to the gentlemen who just made these statements to the House on the two classes of first-class mail, it will be noted from the Post Office report this mail brought an increased income over expenses of $32,000,000, according to the Postal Department. Why should not the 2-cent rate for all letters, both local and outside, be adopted if that be true? I offered an amendment yesterday in our committee to give all such mail the old 2-cent rate. This was the amendment offered:

The Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a colon and the following: Provided, That for experimental purposes such additional rate (of 3 cents) shall not apply, on and after July 1, 1933, to first-class matter.

It is unjust to require first-class mail which the report shows is all carried at a profit to bear the loss caused by other classes of mail, and there is no reason why the 2-cent rate should not be applied to both local and outside letters as long as they are both carried at a profit. If that be true, why not bring up the second-, third-, and fourth-class material nearer to cost of carriage by the Department? My amendment in committee was defeated by a party vote, but it should be adopted in the House and is to be reoffered by Mr. KELLY and on a motion to recommit by Mr. BACHARACH.

But I want also to speak briefly to Members on both sides of the aisle on another matter relating to mails brought to congressional Members by unwarranted newspaper criticism and untrue charges by defeated candidates. Daily papers and weekly papers of this country have carried many articles, syndicated or written by men ignorant of the facts or else purposely intended to deceive as to use of the official franking privilege possessed by Congress. It has been constantly stated that it is a heavy burden, and accounts for the loss reported by postal authorities in reaching the total shown by the report. As stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], who is conceded to be the best authority on the floor of this House, and supported by the Post Office report quoted, the total cost of Government franking is around $700,000, a large part of which is used for official business and publications by the different departments and bureaus of the Government. That covered the entire franking privilege, which carries official information of governmental activities, including legislative matters in Congress, under laws passed over a half century ago, whereas the mail shortage annually on daily papers alone in 1932 was $36,000,000, or 50 times the total amount of all Government franking, as shown by the official statement from the Post Office Department quoted. Broadcasters of discontent aimed at 96 Senators and 435 Representatives and at the President in the past have denounced the Congress repeatedly. One paper in my own State and district. I am advised, assails Congress every week with charges of extravagant use of the franking privilege and for use of restaurant and barber-shop, the latter statement absolutely false as every Member knows.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Later I shall be glad to yield. Postal losses from carrying other "publications" are $40,000,000, as will be noted, while all franking privileges of the Government reach only $700,000, also less than 2 percent of this second item of the Post Office deficit. That is for total franking privileges for the many departments that carry official information as well as official correspondence by Members of Congress.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. All executive departments.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; including also franking of all executive departments.

Many Members who seek to answer unjust newspaper attacks, sometimes false in character, and who send speeches affecting important legislation in which constituents have deep interest, are criticized by publishers who enjoy free mail service.

Let me say not 1 paper in 10 is unfair, and few papers in my State are abusive of Congress, but candidates for Congress publishing papers use poison pens in one case every week, according to reports, and then protest when any answer is offered reciting facts otherwise unknown to the average reader. Yet the loss in postal rates from such papers is 12 times the cost to taxpayers and borne by the Post Office for franking privileges for all the Departments and Congress combined, as will be noted from the postal statement to the committee of comparative deficit items. That is shown by free-in-county newspapers, which are carried free excepting when delivered by carriers. Those small papers probably could not exist in 90 percent of the cases if it were not for these free-in-county postal advantages which are extended by Congress because of educational aid; but if you pick up some papers, you will see syndicated articles and other caustic criticisms that assert Members of Congress are causing this great postal deficit, although the entire franking for all purposes is less than one tenth of 1 percent of the total deficit, and the free-in-the-county papers cost the Government 12 times the cost of total franking for all purposes, but the papers that abuse and yet profit at Government expense do not mention that fact. Daily and weekly papers condemn Members of Congress as responsible for this postal shortage, but when the total franking privilege for all purposes only amounts to one tenth of 1 percent of the total postal expenditures and losses, though losses from dailies alone reach 50 times all franking privileges, it is time to protest. Free-in-county papers' deficit reaches 12 times all franking costs for every purpose, according to the Post Office Department. It should also be understood there is a total shortage of $186,000,000 which does not go to first-class mail, according to the report from the Department. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] says, that is one thing that we will have to meet, and it is borne by taxpayers, whether caused by papers or other publications which carry their own deficits. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] says it will be met by this administration by the President's putting into force increased postal rates, if we will give him the power. It is just to have mail pay something near its cost, but I believe the press deserves aid, and should have it, as Congress has given it in the past, although some papers indicated are vicious in their criticisms of Congress.

I want to impress upon you one fact in this discussion—that first-class mail today brings a profit on local and outside classes. It ought all to be reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents and not carry the losses from second-, third-, and fourth-class mail.

The Post Office statement speaks for itself and is substantially in the same proportion as in other recent years. No fair man will justify loading losses on first-class mail or onto the taxpayers, who have seen the deficit rapidly increase. Ours is the greatest postal service in the world, and for over 50 years Congress has fostered aid to the press and to rural routes without attempt to have each class carry its own cost.

From the RECORD I quote other replies to unwarranted press criticism that should be corrected by reputable papers that gave currency to them. From Mr. BEEDY I quote:

Inasmuch as reference has been made to barber shops and restaurants, it is time to make it a matter of record that there are no free barber shops at this side of the Capitol, and Members pay for everything they eat at the restaurant; in some instances higher than elsewhere.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that our good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in his speech clearly brought out the fact that frankable mail is responsible for only one tenth of 1 percent of the deficit. * * * Much franked matter by all the executive departments should not be franked. * * * As a matter of fact, Congressmen have reduced their salaries 15 percent, or $1,500, in addition to a reduced term of 2 months voted by them, which meant an additional $1,500 reduction, or a total of 30 percent. * * * Congressmen have reduced their mileage 25 percent and their clerical hire $750 per annum.

Mr. Chairman, a publisher of a weekly newspaper recently moved, by reapportionment, to my district, a former Congressman for one term, twice defeated thereafter and again ambitious to return, is a weekly broadcaster of discontent who regularly and unfairly denounces Congress through his paper and other papers that carry his criticisms. His paper, for illustration, is reputed to have 4,000 weekly circulation and has been carried by the Government through the mails in his own county free of cost, excepting where delivered by carrier. These fault-finding comments, if sent through the mail by letter to his readers, would cost him around $2,000 annually for postage, but are carried by the Government free in the county or a comparative saving of from $30,000 to $40,000 during the past 20 years of actual financial profit—a great help to a regular candidate who uses the press and yet complains bitterly of those who seek to answer his unfair criticisms.

Complaints of salaries paid Members, for illustration, were reduced by him to relative values in pork and wheat, although not 1 farmer in 20 pays in pork, wheat, or money any part of such salaries. On the other hand, when a 1-term Member, it is stated here, he received for himself and relatives in his office, pay from the Government at the rate of $15,000 a year, whereas the average Member and family does not receive half that figure for 1933 and 1934. Like my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] I hope to meet on the same platform this critic and to answer some of his criticisms against Congress and myself. This is not offered as a challenge, but a mild protest against a constant stream of abuse.

Beyond this brief personal word all I care to say is that a vote for the motion to recommit on the post office bill, is of the same effect as my own amendment offered in committee, and will put all first-class mail upon the 2-cent rate. I take it every Member has been receiving letters and correspondence demanding that the postage rate on first-class mail be brought down to 2 cents. This has been the experience of most of us. Here is an opportunity by which that can be accomplished.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield; certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask my friend if it is not a fact that the small cost to the Government of franking by Members of excerpts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD does not bring the best results of any money this Government spends? If it were not for the privilege of Members' sending the actual RECORD to their people, the press, sometimes antagonistic, could ruin any man in Congress.

Mr. FREAR. I have so stated and given an instance of one critic in my own district who through his weekly paper, carried through his home county at taxpayers' cost as stated, denounces the Congress in every weekly issue he sends out. However, he complains constantly about the franking privileges enjoyed by Members of Congress, about free meals, free shaves, and incompetence of a Congress of which he was once a brief Member and should know the facts.

To this extent I agree with the statement of the gentleman from Texas; and leaving out my own participation in House deliberations, I concede the gentleman is absolutely correct in the need of some means to answer such critics as he has so fittingly described in the RECORD.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman, I think inadvertently, stated that one tenth of the deficit only was caused by the franking privilege of Members of Congress. What the gentleman meant was one tenth of 1 percent.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; if I so stated, what I meant was one tenth of 1 per cent is the total cost of carriage for franked documents of every description—department, bureau, and every other branch, including Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the question submitted by my friend from Texas is one easily answered that the man who through the press engages in unwarranted criticism always resents any effort to answer. To deny that privilege by speeches, though franked under existing law, while the publisher preserves the right to free carriage of his own paper with probable cost to taxpayers during the last 20 years of many thousands of dollars, is a fair picture of inconsistency that finds it more profitable to criticize at long range than where answers could be offered to the same audience.

Franking is needed to protect Congress from such bushwhacking methods. I am sure every colleague and every fair-minded man will agree with my friend from Texas, who is a fearless fighter and a good legislator. I am also sure that other Members have been subjected to the same unfair criticisms and their acts misrepresented, so that their only protection is by stating the facts to their constituents.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to use 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes to speak about the New House Office Building that was opened today.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire at this time to pay a compliment to the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. David Lynn, and his able assistants, and to call attention to the fact that the New House Office Building was opened this morning for occupancy by Members of the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. The modesty of the gentleman from Illinois, which we all recognize as a very great virtue of his, prevents him from saying that he was the first Member to move in. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. No. The chairman of the committee in charge of this bill [Mr. DOUGHTON] had already moved in, and so had the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. So, in fact, I was third or fourth.

So much has been said in the press and elsewhere of governmental extravagance, particularly in connection with the cost of building construction, that I wanted to call to the attention of the House the unusual situation that is presented on Capitol Hill, where we have actually saved—I will not say "we"—but where there has actually been saved to the Treasury $1,219,745, almost $1,220,000 in the cost of the construction of the New Office Building. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the New House Office Building is today ready for occupancy and arrangements have been made to start moving the effects of Members who will occupy this building. As one Member of the House who has always been interested in construction work, after an inspection of this new building I cannot refrain from making a few observations.

First, I should like to invite the attention of the Members of the House to the considerable savings which have been made in connection with the construction of this building. The Congress authorized for the site and construction of the New House Office Building $8,400,000. Of this amount, $7,500,000 was the authorized limit of cost for the building and $900,000 for the site. The site cost $1,077,745.74, which was $177,745.74 in excess of the authorized limit of cost. This deficiency, under authority of the Congress, was made up out of the appropriation for the building. The cost of the building, estimated as of this date, is $6,280,254, and the anticipated saving under the authorized limit of cost for site and building, including the $177,745.74 used from the building appropriation for the site, is $1,219,745.74. The original authorization did not include furnishings. The Congress authorized an expenditure not to exceed $400,000, to be included in the authorized limit of cost for building and site, for this purpose. The furnishings are estimated to cost approximately $228,000, a saving of $172,000 under the authorized limit of cost. It gives considerable satisfaction, therefore, to note that the site was purchased and the building constructed and completely furnished for practically a million dollars less than the authorized limit of cost of the entire project.

Mr. Chairman, another unusual incident in connection with this great building is that less than one half of 1 percent of the contract price of $5,270,000 has been added for the payment of extras, changes, modifications in plans to meet the desires for committee rooms and a thousand other structural changes. I think this is most unusual and distinctly complimentary to those who so successfully guarded the Public Treasury.

With my experience in construction work, I consider this outstanding and an indication that the plans and specifications prepared by the architects were complete in all details and that the work was carried on with intelligent supervision.

I desire especially to compliment Mr. David Lynn, the Architect of the Capitol, and his very able assistant, a former commander of the American Navy, Commander H. D. Rouzer.

Then I want to compliment the allied architects of the District of Columbia who drew the plans for this building, who are responsible for its beautiful architecture, its beautiful shrubbery, and its great courtyard. The building will long stand as one of the architectural monuments of the Nation's Capital.

I wish also to compliment the three Speakers of the House who are responsible for the promotion of this beautiful structure—Speakers Longworth, Garner, and Rainey; and the two distinguished members of the House Office Building Commission, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Bacharach] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou]. Mr. Edward Brown, the present capable Superintendent of the House Office Building, has contributed much toward the successful assignment of rooms, the care of special cases, and the good humor of an otherwise arduous task.

We hear so much criticism of our actions, talk about barber shops, shower baths, and things like that. I think it well at a time like today, when we are starting to move into these new quarters, to call attention to a governmental activity which has been economically concluded with credit to everyone who is responsible for its being.

The fine spirit which has been displayed by everybody connected with this new structure had in mind not only a proper working place for Members of Congress but, first and foremost, the interest of the Federal Treasury. A million more might have been spent without any better results. This is a matter I take pleasure in calling to the attention of the House.

Mr. Chairman, may I also invite attention to the general design of this building, both as to the exterior and interior, which are dignified and simple. The arrangement of the interior of the building has been well planned. The office suites are complete in each and every detail; the assembly rooms and committee rooms, which are air-conditioned, should prove a source of comfort to those using the same. The treatment of the court of this building is most effective. The planting, which consists of American hollies, dogwoods, boxwoods, and other attractive shrubbery, and the fountain, surrounded by a grass plot, and walks, with colorful paving stones, are a pleasure to look upon.

It is a great satisfaction to feel that the New House Office Building project was well planned, and the building provided at a minimum cost in the shortest practicable time. The general contractors were the Consolidated Engineering Co. of Baltimore.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. Inasmuch as reference has been made to barber shops and restaurants, I think this is the time for us to make it a matter of record that there are no free barber shops here on this side of the Capitol; that everybody who has any service performed in these shops pays for it; that they are open to the public; that our restaurant is open to the public; that the Members pay for everything they eat, at prices that are in some instances higher than obtain elsewhere.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I am pleased that the gentleman has called attention to that fact.

Further, I want to compliment our two colleagues, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH]. Only the older Members of the House realize that these two representatives of the House are busy at all hours of the day and night looking out for our interests, and in the construction of this building they are to be highly complimented, because they have sat in with the allied architects from time to time; they have sat in with the Architect of the Capitol from time to time; they have sat in with the contractors from time to time, and have watched over the construction of this building just as carefully as though they themselves were paying for its construction. I think it is an ideal position for them to occupy, and they must look with very great satisfaction upon this building, which very largely is what we may call their own baby. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, as a former Republican postmaster, I should like to go on record in favor of this bill, especially with reference to the Post Office Department.

As I see it, this is the most progressive and outstanding recommendation which has reached this Congress, not only in this session but in any other session.

The heads of the Post Office administration are old-fashioned and inefficient. The Post Office Department is due for a shake-up in the interest of the American taxpayer, but they cannot attain this improvement unless the Congress will release them from the stranglehold of existing law.

For 8 years I watched the Post Office Department attempting to bring in innovations of a helpful character in the interest of the people, and consistently they have been held back by the Congress.

I say this is the most progressive bill that has reached us, because it gives the new administration complete power to change the interior administration of the Post Office Department for the benefit and in the interest of the taxpayer unfettered by the control which Congress has over it, which in too many instances pulls here and there from various interested sources.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. In just a moment.

I am going to give you the one reason why I am in favor of the 2-cent postage rate on local matter.

The records show, according to an examination of my friends out in California, that third-class matter going through the mail under permit mailing causes the Government a loss of 15 mills on each piece of such mail matter carried through the mails, whereas a piece of second-class mail matter going through any city in a local way gives a profit of one forty-ninth of 1 cent, or approximately one-half cent per piece. In other words, every piece of third-class matter today being handled in the post office in any of the cities is handled at a loss, and in addition the third-class matter as it is handled today is unsatisfactory to the mailing public.

I prefer the 2-cent rate. The 2-cent rate will bring revenue to the Department and at the same time will give the Government more efficient service.

I am not one of the Members who has criticized the newspapers because they receive advantages under the present law. As a matter of fact, if the newspapers would publish the facts with regard to Congress, with regard to what we do and what we do not do, I think they would earn the subsidy which they now have.

As the publisher of a national periodical I am not alarmed about this project. I have the greatest confidence in our President in regulating these postal matters in the interest of the American taxpayers and not to the advantage either of the publisher of a periodical or a large mailing concern. All questions are going to be determined on justice and in the best interest of the Government.

I should like to call your attention to some of the uneconomical conditions which obtain in the Post Office Department today. They are stupendous and foolish, and the interior administration should be changed, as well as the postal rates.

Mops, brooms, and all the common articles and all supplies used in west-coast post offices are mailed from the city of Washington, at first-class postage rates in the baggage car. This is not right. It is a loss for the taxpayer, and a clear subsidy to the common carriers.

Another very glaring inconsistency and uneconomical proceeding of administration is the differentiation which exists between post offices of the third and second class. If a postmaster today sells $7,999 worth of stamps, he is a third-class postmaster. Next year if he sells $8,001 worth of stamps, or just barely goes over the $8,000 limit, he is a second-class postmaster.

As postmaster in an office of the third class I received $2,100 per annum for clerk hire, but when I sold stamps the succeeding year totaling over $8,000 I was given clerk hire credit for over $3,600, plus approximately $1,000 additional increase in carriers' compensation. To be more specific the Government expended approximately $2,500 additional per annum in my office because I sold a few dollars more stamps than I did the year before.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I want to ask the gentleman whether this bill will cure that situation.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I anticipate that the reorganization plan will take care of that, and I have confidence in the present Post Office management to rectify this matter, as well as adjust postage rates.

I am going to speak now with reference to the Congress. It has been mentioned here that the loss to the Government is one tenth of 1 per cent on account of the franking privilege of Members of Congress. I have here in my hand a book which costs the American taxpayers $324,000 per year, because the Members of Congress want to send this book, unsolicited in the majority of instances, to the farmers and other people of the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. This is only one of the many pamphlets which we send out.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Not now.

I have been told that a "lame duck" Member of the last Congress sent out 1,600 bags of mail through the post office in his own interest, planning to run for Congress at the next election. One Member of this Congress has 50,000 mailing plates in his office by which he can turn out addresses in order to send out to his constituents speeches or anything else of a beneficial nature to himself.

It is a loss of $1,500 to the taxpayers every time he sends out a full mailing. I am in favor of the curtailment of these free publications, which are an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. What publications does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HOEPPEL. This publication I have here is the Year Book of 1923, 10 years old, and is yet going through the mails. If I mailed a copy of it as a private citizen, it would cost 28 cents.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Has the gentleman sent out any himself?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I have not.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to stop the publication altogether. It is worthless to the farmers.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I am in favor of stopping the publication, and I am in favor of stopping the franking privilege, except on absolutely official matters. I wish to tell you what happened in the last campaign. In the last campaign a candidate for office, an incumbent, used the franking privilege to get his name before the electorate. He sent to me and other people petitions asking them, "Do you not desire me to send you a certain kind of bulletin?" He was trying to get in the public eye so he could obtain their votes. I protest against a man's using the franking privilege to perpetuate himself in office.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. Does the gentleman understand that under the terms of this bill that can be corrected?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes; and I am in favor of it; it is the most progressive piece of legislation presented in this Congress to date.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as soon as this Congress convened, I introduced a bill, being H.R. 108, to restore the 2-cent rate on first-class mail matter, which, after its enacting clause, provides:

That subsection (a) of section 1001 of the Revenue Act of 1932 (47 Stat. 285) is hereby repealed to take effect on July 1, 1933, and thereafter the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class shall be the same as the rate in force on July 5, 1932.

It is my firm belief that a mistake was committed when the rate was raised from 2 to 3 cents. I was strongly against such raise at the time it was made. It was put over on the country at the instance of Postmaster General Brown, aided and handled by the then Republican Secretary of the Treasury, Ogden Mills.

I had hoped that the committee would favorably report and pass my bill, H.R. 108, or a similar one pending before it, so that the 3-cent rate might be repealed outright and only 2 cents charged on all first-class mail, but the committee has reported a bill that will give us a 2-cent rate only on drop letters—that is, letters to be delivered at the office where mailed. That is some relief, but it is not enough. I intend to continue my fight for a 2-cent rate until it applies to all first-class mail.

Likewise when this Congress convened I introduced a bill, being H.R. 107, to repeal the tax on bank checks, which, after its enacting clause, provides:

That part VI of title V of the Revenue Act of 1932 (relating to the tax on checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money) is hereby repealed.

That bill also is now pending before the Committee on Ways and Means and it ought to be passed before this session adjourns. This 2-cent tax on bank checks has caused many people to take their money out of banks, and the harm thus done has outweighed the tax benefits received.

I am in favor, also, of repealing the tax on electric current, which falls heavily upon every poor family in the Nation. Surely we can find other sources of taxation that will produce sufficient revenue that will not cause the burden to be borne by those not able to bear it.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that our good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in his speech clearly brought out the fact that frankable mail is responsible for only one tenth of 1 percent of the deficit. There is much matter franked through the mails by all of the executive departments of the Government which should not be franked, and which is useless and a waste pure and simple. And we ought to stop it. There are many bulletins, documents, and books sent through the mail under congressional frank which are absolutely useless and a waste, and we ought to stop both the printing and distribution of them. But the privilege of sending through the mail bills, hearings, committee reports, and excerpts from debates in Congress is of great value to the people, especially when we require that the printing of same shall not cost the Government a penny, and the Member distributing same must pay for printing such excerpts. The distribution costs the Government very little. We have our postmasters, postal clerks, and carriers, all paid by the year, and they would receive just as much if no matter were distributed under congressional frank.

In his radio speech the other night President Roosevelt stated that the Post Office Department wanted more business, that it could handle, with its present set-up, about double what we are now handling without additional expense. It is, therefore, foolish for sensational newspapers and soap-box politicians seeking to break into office, to assert that excerpts from debates distributed under congressional frank constitute any great charge on the Government. It has been proven in the debate today that all matters from all departments distributed under frank constitutes only one tenth of 1 percent of the deficit in the Post Office Department, while the mailing subsidy enjoyed by newspapers alone costs the Government over $100,000,000 annually.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the privilege of sending through the mails excerpts thereof reprinted at the expense of Congressmen, is the only safeguard Members here have against being misquoted over the country. If it were not for this means of correcting erroneous impressions broadcast through the press to the public, Members here would be at the mercy of the press and at the mercy of every ambitious politician who constantly misquotes the real facts in our districts far away while we are here attending to business.

Only last Friday, April 13, 1933, there appeared on page 15 of the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram a news item in large type headed "Urges Decrease in Congressmen's Pay", with the following deliberate misstatement:

Now that the salaries of Federal employees have been slashed 15 percent, Congressmen should reduce their own remuneration at least to the same extent, Joe Jones, former district attorney of Eastland County, said while here yesterday on legal business.

Joe Jones, when he made that statement, knew that Congressmen had already done the very thing that he said they should do, yet he sought to have the public believe otherwise. This daily newspaper, the Star-Telegram, carries the Associated Press and other dispatches from Washington, and has an able representative who sits in the press gallery here and must have known that the said assertion of Jones was incorrect, because it has been known generally all over the country that Congressmen did reduce their remuneration in the same proportion, yet this paper carried Jones' misstatement. As a matter of fact, Congressmen have reduced their own salaries 15 percent, which means a reduction of $1,500 a year to them, and this, too, is in addition to the reduced term of 2 months cut off the term of each Member, which meant another $1,500 cut. And Congressmen have reduced their mileage 25 percent, and have reduced their stationery allowance 25 percent, and have reduced their allowance for clerical hire $750 per annum, all of which should have been known to Joe Jones and to the Star-Telegram, which nevertheless published the misstatement. And it will be remembered that this is the same Joe Jones who last year published in the Star-Telegram the misstatement that the House of Representatives paid our Chaplain $11 for each prayer, and paid our Clerk of the House $55 per day just for sitting at a door, when in truth and in fact the Clerk of the House does not sit at a door and gets an annual salary of $6,000, less the present 15 percent cut, for working 365 days each year, and with several hundred employees under him to look after, and our Chaplain receives a salary of $1,680 per year, less the present 15 percent cut, for acting as the spiritual leader of 435 congressional families 365 days in the year. Such misstatements and misrepresentations must be corrected, and our only means of doing it is through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will take very little time in further discussion of the bill. I want to call attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], and the very complete analysis of the postal-rate situation which he brought to the attention of the House.

I interrupted him with the question as to whether or not he had been consulted by the officials of the Post Office Department in bringing in this bill. Naturally, he smiled, saying he had not been, because we know that those who have been consulted have been consulted purely from the standpoint of partisan politics.

Our colleague, Mr. KELLY, from Pennsylvania, is an expert and has studied for years the question of postal rates. If it was a question of expert advice from any man in either branch of Congress certainly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] should have been called into that consultation.

Our friends tell us that this is purely a nonpartisan subject. If that were true, why exclude the best expert in Congress from any suggestion, advice, or assistance?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], during the past several years, has been sponsoring legislation for the Post Office Department, and yet the deficit has gradually increased.

Mr. TREADWAY. Neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor the chairman of the Post Office Committee had anything to do with this increase of the rates on first-class mail matter. That came from the committee of which the gentleman from North Carolina is chairman, and 24 other Representatives are members.

It came from the Ways and Means Committee on the recommendation or the desire on the part of the last administration to raise revenue in an effort to balance the Budget in a fairly reasonable manner.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. But this deficit existed before this emergency legislation was passed.

Mr. TREADWAY. What emergency legislation?

Mr. ALLGOOD. The raising of the postage to 3 cents. The deficit was caused by bills presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] prior to the bill increasing postage. He opposed the bill raising postage to 3 cents. It was done on a bill presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] and he had charge of legislation from the Post Office Department.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I yielded for a question, not for a speech, and I should like to ask the gentleman a question in return. Is the bill before us today an emergency measure?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Absolutely; it is a part of the emergency program.

Mr. TREADWAY. Very well. If it is an emergency matter, why do not you face the situation today and give us a 2-cent postal rate, without any option to any administrative official? You do not dare to do it, because you have orders to do differently.

Mr. ALLGOOD. We do not know today what emergency will be tomorrow, and we are giving some leeway in this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is another question coming up, according to a section that I read a few days ago in one of the President's messages to Congress. He expects to make some recommendation within a short time about tariff reductions and revisions. I suppose those are also emergency matters, from the viewpoint of the Democrats, and we will be given, as Members of Congress, no right or authority to have anything to do with tariff legislation after you confer this power on the President of the United States.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. And there is still further an emergency proposition, namely, that we close our mills and manufactories in this country and bring in the goods of foreign countries, if we reduce the tariff according to the doctrine of the Democratic leaders of today.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Very briefly, for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. ALLGOOD. When the Republicans were in power and when the Ways and Means Committee brought in the last tariff bill, the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, were the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means permitted to sit in on that bill when it was being written?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I sat in as a conferee with my Democratic associates, and I know this——

Mr. ALLGOOD. But in the preparation of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am answering the gentleman's question, and I am not going to yield any further along that line. I know this, that when the House conferees sat in on the last tariff bill we were bulldozed by a member of another branch to put a 7-cent duty on cotton. Never was there a more unreasonable tariff rate written than the Democratic members on this conference committee insisted upon going into that bill.

Mr. ALLGOOD. The Democrats were not permitted to sit in on the writing of that bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him one question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that if the President did send in a message to reduce the tariff, and we reduced it, it would cause the big interests of this country to bring their factories from Europe that have been driven over there on account of your tariff and give our American laborers a job? Does the gentleman not think that would be a good thing?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, that question is so old it has whiskers on it. I think you will have plenty of chance to manufacture goods abroad when you bring in your 6-hour bill and put it through. My two good friends on the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] seem to have a very different comprehension of the purposes of this optional power they are asking us to grant to the President of the United States. One of them says that the $102,000,000 deficit from second-class postage is the cause of granting that power, and he wants to do away with this tremendous deficit, or with a big part of it, by raising the second-class rates. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] takes the opposite position on that proposition. He tells us that very likely if this optional power is granted the President of the United States—and he called particular attention to the word "modification" as it appears in section 2 of the bill—the rates on all other classes than the first class would be again reduced. How in the name of all that is good can a reduction of that nature assist in an emergency balancing of this Budget? Then the gentlemen quote experts, experts of the Department. Well, we had that so-called "expert" before us the day before yesterday, and while I do not think that he illuminated the situation a whole lot, yet he was sent to us at the request of the chairman of the committee as a departmental expert. He told us that on the basis of the present volume of business the reduction of the 3-cent rate on nonlocal first-class mail to 2 cents would reduce the revenue in the neighborhood of $60,000,000, and that applied to local drop letters it would reduce the revenue $17,000,000 more, but he also said that he thought there would be a revival of the use of the 2-cent rate on local mail sufficiently so that the deficit from this class of mail would be about 9 or 10 million dollars. If you are going to take that expert advice, it seems to me to be pretty evident that there cannot be much further reduction and still use this argument as a means of balancing the Budget, and claim it is emergency legislation.

There has been a great deal said about Members on the Republican side going along with the economy program. There is not a Member of this House who did not realize that was emergency legislation, and we were glad to follow the advice of the President of the United States in the emergency. Who can offer any proof whatsoever that we are today facing an emergency in connection with this particular bill? Nobody has answered the inquiry propounded originally by the minority leader. If you recognize there is an emergency here, why do you not vote it now? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], I understand, will offer as an amendment, when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule, an item that was in the bill originally introduced by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. I have heard only one Democrat say he expected to vote for that change. We can do it here and now. We can make a universal 2-cent postage rate and not ask for modification authority in the hands of the administration.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman's Postmaster General, Mr. Brown, had this 3-cent rate put on the people, we then tried to get the gentleman not to let him do it. What has come over the gentleman now that he wants to undo what Mr. Brown did?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Brown did not have anything to do with this. Mr. Brown did not come before the conferees on the tax bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But it was his fine Italian hand that caused it to be put in.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I know where the suggestion came from. I sat in with other gentlemen at that conference.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman deny that Ogden Mills did it?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, he is not Mr. Brown. I will say to the gentleman that Mr. Ogden Mills never appeared before the conferees, to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. BLANTON. But it was his fine Italian hand that did it, in conjunction with the suggestion of Mr. Brown.

Mr. TREADWAY. That was nothing in comparison to the fine Italian hand that is working for every kind of proposition to turn all the authority of Congress over to the administration at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. That is better than what has been done in the past.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to go along with the administration in a nonpartisan manner. I have done so by my votes, but I do not think the time has yet arrived when Congress should abrogate its entire power and authority over all types of legislation, of which this postage rate is but one instance.

Mr. Chairman, we hear on this floor and elsewhere a great deal about germaneness. I should like to ask my friends what the germane relationship is between continuing a gasoline tax and reducing or raising, as the case may be, postal rates in the same bill? We are adjourning here from day to day, without a great deal of business. The orders are not coming fast enough from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue for us to keep active. I do not see any good reason for considering as germane the relationship between continuing the gasoline tax and a change of postal rates, whether up or down, both in one bill.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman to explain that.

Mr. RAGON. I am not going to explain; but I am going to ask my friend to explain. If the gentleman objects to the germaneness of extending for a year the gasoline tax and adjusting the postal rates, why did not the gentleman interpose the same objection of germaneness the last time when we had the creation of the tax on gasoline and also the increase in postal rates in the same bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I was not aware that it was, other than at the conference between the two branches of the Congress. If I am in error, I shall be very glad to acknowledge the mistake; but I think the gentleman will admit that I brought up this question in the Ways and Means Committee as to why we could not separate the two subject matters.

Mr. RAGON. I know; but for practical purposes, I will ask the gentleman what is the difference between now and in the last session?

Mr. TREADWAY. But let me ask the gentleman what are the practical purposes to be accomplished, other than taking further instructions from the executive branch as to the type of legislation we advocate on this floor?

Mr. RAGON. Well, that is a matter of judgment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened earnestly to the remarks of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle in their opposition to this bill. This is an administration measure. It is a measure that has great merit. It ought to have the united support of every Member of this House.

I notice the gentleman directing the opposition, before he was seated, said he expected to vote for the bill. The gentleman questioned the emergency that has now arisen under which we are considering the legislation. Mr. Chairman, the bill speaks for itself.

THE GASOLINE TAX

This bill extends for another year the gasoline tax. As an emergency measure to assist in balancing the Budget, I am ready and willing to support this measure on that basis. However, I believe it unfair to force one industry to bear such a tremendous tax burden, and just as soon as possible this tax should be repealed and such a tax left entirely to the respective States.

THE POSTAL DEFICIT

This measure places in the hands of the Chief Executive the right to modify the postal rates. Let me call to your attention the fact that each of the gentlemen who has spoken in opposition to this bill has favored striking out the heart of the bill, which allows the Chief Executive this power. Apparently they are unwilling to trust the Chief Executive in this matter. It seems poor taste to me that they come before this Congress in that attitude. For the past 12 years we have had a Republican administration. I know and you know the result of that Republican administration and how they have failed and refused year after year, when they had control of this House, to balance the budget in the Post Office Department. For example, in the last 5 years what do we find the facts to be? We find a deficit that has occurred in the Post Office Department in second-, third-, and fourth-class mail alone, totaling $784,437,255.82, as follows:

THE POSTAL DEFICIT

Loss on second-class matter:
1928	$85,281,085.36
1929	94,471,038.64
1930	90,165,448.46
1931	96,973,717.40
1932	102,268,659.62
Loss on second-class matter, 5 years, 1928–32		$469,159,949.48
Loss on third-class matter:
1928	$6,285,850.09
1929	18,806,911.23
1930	21,502,047.62
1931	23,388,894.82
1932	28,909,363.27
Loss on third-class matter, 5 years, 1928–32		98,893,067.03
Loss on fourth-class matter:
1928	$7,039,930.40
1929	28,050,255.31
1930	25,910,222.37
1931	27,791,089.81
1932	34,431,027.20
Loss on fourth-class matter, 5 years, 1928–32		124,222,525.10
Loss on daily newspapers under second class, not including free in county, which is grouped with other publications:
1929	$34,790,104.20
1930	32,260,750.17
1931	34,566,247.97
1932	36,409,573.82
Total loss on daily newspapers, 4 years, 1929–32		138,026,676.16
Losses on second-, third-, and fourth-class mail:
1928	$110,639,517.91
1929	162,689,837.76
1930	162,098,355.28
1931	150,471,423.25
1932	198,538,121.62
Losses on second-, third-, and fourth-class mail, 5 years		784,437,255.82

Yet the gentlemen who are opposing this bill now and who are objecting to its consideration would have us strike out of the bill the very thing that allows the Chief Executive to adjust and modify these rates to stop these continuing deficits. Apparently they are unwilling to give him this authority. You who have heard their speeches do not have to wonder any more why this Congress has been unable to balance the budget in this Department. It has been due primarily to such dilatory tactics and lack of courage as we have found here on this floor today.

It seems to me, looking at it from every standpoint, that this is a fine piece of legislation, one that very probably will stop the deficit that has been running into more than $200,000,000 annually for the past several years; and I trust when the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle consider these facts, they will vote with us and allow the President of the United States to modify and adjust these rates to stop this tremendous deficit. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this piece of legislation works out as we surmise it will, but I wish we had gone just a little farther and made a universal 2-cent rate on first-class mail matter. However, I shall support this measure as I shall any measure that will directly benefit all the people.

I just received a letter from my city. I wondered why I had not been receiving correspondence on this 30-hour week proposition from the working class as I had from employers. I received one letter which said the folks cannot afford to send you letters because they do not have 3 cents to pay the postage. I think possibly they might be able to pay 2 cents. Yet these employers can send me telegrams and phone me. So the people in the upper strata still have a little money left.

I shall go along with the President in this matter and hope he will revise the rates on second-, third-, and fourth-class mail matter. That is what I am interested in. I am sure he will. If this Postal Department does make a little more money and take up some of the slack, we may be able to restore the 15 percent we took away from the Government employees and deserving veterans in an effort to get back to the 1926 standard of living. The way things are heading, with the President saying that we will have a justified expansion, I am confident if we go along with our President in his measures intended to build up general prosperity in the Nation the day will not be far off when all our citizens will be enabled to live again in a manner becoming our civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas just stated that the Republicans were using dilatory tactics in respect of this legislation. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas, and generally to the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, that we on this side stand ready today to do what the chairman of your committee and what the Postmaster General of the United States says ought to be done. If this is dilatory tactics, I do not understand the meaning of the word.

It has also been said by one Member on the other side that the purpose of this bill was to give the President of the United States power to raise second-, third-, and fourth-class postage rates, and by another Member on the majority side that the distinct purpose of the bill was for an entirely different purpose. Now, I should like to have someone representing the administration tell me what the purpose of the bill is. We are confused at this time as to whether the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] speaks for the administration.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. I can only say I spoke as the result of a conference with the heads of the Departments mentioned by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] tells me he made the statement that the statement was correct that the gentleman from New York adverted to; and the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] were correct.

Mr. SNELL. Well, some of us want to follow the administration, but we want to know which one of you speak for it.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I cannot yield, because I have only a moment's time.

Now, as far as the emergency is concerned, this is not an emergency proposition as compared with the other propositions on which we followed the President's advice at the beginning of the session. This proposition has been here for nearly 2 years. Your own committee has been making the study They have the best advice and the best information available on this proposition at the present time. They are the people who will advise the Postmaster General. The chairman of this committee has said repeatedly before this House that he has made up his mind what ought to be done, what will bring more revenue to the Federal Government; and I say, Mr. Chairman, if we are interested in balancing the Budget and balancing it now, we should adopt the recommendation previously made to the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and adopt a 2-cent rate for first-class mail, and do it here today. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from New Jersey are very solicitous that the people may have the benefit of a flat reduction in postage rates on first-class mail matter from 3 cents to 2 cents, but so far as I know this solicitude has been made manifest only today. I have heard nothing prior to this time upon their part that this matter should be taken up and considered and the people given the benefit of the relief carried in this bill.

The distinguished minority leader, who has just taken his seat, wants to know who is responsible, who represents the administration in regard to this measure. I may say to my distinguished friend that we are going along together, that this bill is the result of deliberations and conferences as to what is best to do under existing circumstances.

I am as firmly in favor of giving a 2-cent rate on all first-class mail matter as anyone here if it can safely be done, but those on the other side who are so anxious to make political capital out of this measure, and so desperately in need of some political relief, know that today we are operating under an emergency. All our legislation is more or less of an emergency character. No one will deny that these are abnormal times. We had laid in the lap of this administration not only a broken, bankrupt, empty Treasury but a deficit of $3,000,000,000. This exigency was so great that the last President of the United States, when the revenue bill of 1932 was under consideration in the last session of Congress, said that unless something was done immediately to balance the Budget the economic structure of the Government would fall.

This bill was brought in as an emergency measure and all these hateful taxes, including the Federal tax on gasoline, the increase of 1 cent on first-class postage, the infamous 2-cent tax on bank checks, were all of an emergency nature made necessary by the maladministration of the Republican Party, as you all well know. [Applause.]

We are now trying, the best we can, free of partisanship and in a patriotic spirit, to hold up the hands of the administration that is making such an earnest effort to balance the Budget without additional taxes. Instead of the gentleman inveighing against this patriotic effort of our great President he should be upholding his hands. If our party had left the country in the condition that your party left it and had delivered it into your hands as you have delivered it into our hands, it would not lie in my mouth to interpose some partisan criticism, as the gentleman is doing, and raise a partisan issue such as he is endeavoring to raise here today.

Mr. Chairman, under this bill, if enacted into law, we are certain of relief to the extent of reducing first-class local postage from 3 cents to 2 cents; and then, after experimentation, investigation, and a survey, and the matter is tested out, a further reduction will be made. Everyone knows we are not in a situation now to determine that, but we feel certain that on local mail matter we will not lose any revenue by going back to 2 cents; but it requires further study and a further survey to determine whether or not we will lose revenue if we go back to a flat 2-cent rate all the way down the line.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. One of the gentleman's previous speakers said he thought it could be done in 2 or 3 days, but that is not what I wanted to ask the gentleman. If the gentleman and all the representative men on that side have made up their minds, as the gentleman says they have, as to what ought to be done, why do you not tell us why you are not willing to do it here today?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It should be done just as soon as it can be done expediently, just as soon as it can be done with due regard for the Treasury, as I have stated to my good friend; but none is so blind as those who will not see—but having eyes and see not and ears and hear not and minds and understand not. Of course, I cannot make the gentleman understand. [Laughter.]

The reason we do not do it now is we do not know and the gentleman does not know just what the effect upon the receipts of the Treasury will be. If this works out all right, as we expect, and business that has been driven away is restored, then we can proceed intelligently and go the whole way.

With the President of the United States trying in every way to effect economy in every branch of the Government and to balance the Budget without additional taxes, now, does the gentleman have the least fear that the President of the United States will not extend this reduction if it can be done without loss of revenue? No one can tell yet how business will increase. No one can tell exactly just how business is going to revive, and until we have further light and further information it is only pursuing the course of safety and prudence to proceed cautiously. We can and we will trust the President of the United States, and the partisan issue which the gentleman raises on that side will return to plague him in the future.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Far from being partisan today, I have praised your Postmaster General and the chairman of your own committee for the intelligent conclusions they have come to in regard to the 2-cent postage rate, and what more information is the gentleman going to get than the information that has already been obtained by 2 years of investigation?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will tell the gentleman what more information we will get. When we get the "Brownism" out of the Post Office Department and get it completely under the control of "Farleyism" and away from the subordinates from whom we have received much misinformation, and when we get all the "Mellonism" out of the Treasury Department, we will then be prepared to go forward intelligently and consider these questions in the light of correct information. [Applause.] This is what we are suffering from now.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman state that Mr. Farley is entirely nonpartisan in this matter?

Mr. DOUGHTON. We do not know whether we are getting correct or incorrect information from the Post Office Department now. You cannot change a crew of trainmen overnight; but just as soon as we are rid of all the "Brownism" in the Post Office Department and all the "Mellonism" in the Treasury Department, then we will know how to proceed, and we can proceed intelligently and safely in matters of legislation that concern those Departments. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that we do not want to make the same fatal mistake that the previous administration made, and therefore we are proceeding cautiously?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman intend to put in new experts to make up these figures, or is the gentleman going to use the same men who have been in the Department for many years?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman from New York knows that I am not the head of the Post Office Department. I am not the Postmaster General; but the gentleman knows that the man who is at the head of the Department, and whom he knows well, is capable and is competent and knows how to run the Department, and will not go to the gentleman from New York, the minority leader, for guidance as to how to conduct the affairs of the Post Office Department. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 629 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by striking out the following: ", or after June 30, 1933, in the case of articles taxable under section 617, relating to the tax on gasoline."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise in support of the bill and trust that the committee will accept it. The deficit of the Post Office Department is largely a heritage from the Republican administration, and it seems to me that gentlemen on the other side of the aisle should be the first to help right the wrongs of that administration.

It is common information that large leases were entered into during the past few years which have contributed materially to the deficit of the Post Office Department.

I read a story where a building was leased for post-office purposes at 90 percent per annum of the actual value of the property. Think of such an amount being paid for post-office quarters.

I also know that it is common information that hundreds of automobiles have been purchased by Post Office officials so that they might ride around at the expense of the taxpayers. Yes; we remember how Postmaster General Brown bought an extra large auto to take care of his high silk hat top. Such was ridiculous. I know also that unusual expensive practices have been indulged in by employing special representatives of Postmaster General Brown to go over the country and ascertain who should be appointed as postmasters. They were known as special representatives of the Post Office Department and paid probably $10,000 a year salary and upwards, if expenses were counted in—a pernicious practice.

If this bill is adopted we have no fear that the new administration will weed out all this dead timber, eliminate unnecessary expenses, and, if necessary, revise the postal rates on second-, third-, and fourth-class matter. I believe that many Members realize that there should be some revision in rates on second-, third-, and fourth-class matter.

There is no doubt in my mind but that the President will, in a short time, reduce first-class postage on all letters down to 2 cents. I believe that will come about shortly. I am not afraid to trust the President with this power and this authority. I trust that the Congress will give him this power and authority, because I want the President to have full power to make further reductions and eliminate further unnecessary expenditures along with the 15-percent reduction in salaries that has already been ordered. If postal employees are to lose 15 percent of their salaries, then other economies should also be effected. If these reforms are adopted, I believe there will be no deficit in the Post Office Department in the next 12 months.

I think the franking privilege should be eliminated. I use it and I shall use it as long as it is authorized, because my constituents are entitled to every possible service existing. Members of the Congress and all Government officials should pay their own postage. Taxpayers' money should not be used to buy automobiles, gasoline, postage stamps, and other class privileges for public officials, be they local, State, or National. The American people are tired of such abuses, and they must cease. Such abuses are resented by the American people. High salaries and allowances have made a wide gap between the workingman and the officeholder. If practically all local, State, and Federal salaries were reduced from 50 to 75 percent and all allowances canceled, then the American people would once again have faith in public officials and there would be hope and recovery. This gap should be filled. Discriminations should be eliminated. One adult person out of every ten in America was living on taxpayers' money in 1932. We must retrench and economize in Government affairs until business conditions improve and the currency is expanded.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am in favor of a radical reduction of expenditures in the Post Office Department, but the Post Office Department is not the only activity that has been guilty of extravagance, waste, and prodigality in the expenditure of public funds. It is the only one of the instrumentalities of the Government that serves every nook and corner of the Nation and touches alike rich and poor, high and low, and contributes to the comfort, convenience, and welfare of practically every man, woman, and child in the United States.

A large majority of the American people never come in contact with any other department of the Government, and they regard the Post Office Department as the principal governmental activity, because it is the only one that serves them, and they know that such service has been efficient and satisfactory. But, my friends, in reducing Government expenses we should not make fish of one department and fowl of another. Other departments are spending money prodigally. The printing bill of the Department of Commerce is scandalously excessive; in fact so wasteful that its investigation and audit would amaze and shock right-thinking men. For the fiscal year 1931 the Department of Commerce expended $2,894,677 for printing, approximately six times the total cost of carrying all franked mail of Senators and Representatives.

As Chairman of the Committee on the Census, I have had an opportunity to learn something about the inexcusable extravagance of the Census Bureau, which is one of the activities of the Department of Commerce. Our mails are burdened with publications issued by that Bureau, consisting of statistical data, charts, bulletins, tables, graphs, and diagrams relating to matters in which not one man in a thousand has the slightest interest, and although they serve no useful purpose, they are nevertheless costing enormous sums and helping unbalance our National Budget. This extravagant printing bill adds to the tax load of an already burdened public. A large army of Government employees cumber the pay rolls and sap the substance of the people. The enormous expense of preparing, publishing, and circulating this data cannot be justified by anyone who believes in economy in the expenditure of public funds. About the only, if any, useful purpose these publications serve is to furnish employment to a host of individuals whose services might well be dispensed with without in any degree impairing the usefulness of any Government activity.

If you would take the time to examine some of these tables, charts, graphs, diagrams, and bulletins, you would be first amused, then amazed and indignant that Government funds collected from a tax-burdened public should be used for such unnecessary, unwarranted, and prodigal purposes.

On July 8, 1932, I discussed at some length the waste and extravagance of the several executive departments. My remarks appear on page 14918 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Seventy-second Congress, first session. I presented facts and statistics which I believe are worthy of your attention. For instance, Uncle Sam's total printing bill for 1931 was $14,546,440, of which approximately $3,000,000 was spent by the Department of Commerce, over $1,000,000 by the Department of Agriculture, nearly $2,000,000 by the Post Office Department, nearly $1,000,000 by the Treasury Department, $747,000 by the Navy Department, $684,000 by the War Department.

In my remarks I demonstrated that the Congress or the legislative department was the most economical branch of our Government.

According to the cost ascertainment committee, it cost the Government 16 times as much to carry "free in county" newspapers as the total cost of carrying the franked mail of all the Senators and Members of the House. Moreover, it cost the Government 16 times as much to carry the franked, postage-free, or so-called "penalty mail" of the 10 executive departments as it cost to carry the franked mail of the Members of the House and Senate.

Now, remember, all postage-free mail is not franked mail, and all franked mail is not mail carried for Members of Congress. The computed cost of carrying all postage-free mail in the fiscal year 1931 was as follows:

Franked mail of Senators and Representatives	$530,298.50
Franked mail other than for Members of Congress	98,680.03
Mail carried free in county for newspapers	8,425,242.11
Mail for the blind	106,932.85
Penalty mail for Post Office and other departments and branches of Government	8,643,300.46
Total postage-free mail	17,804,453.95

You will notice that the cost of carrying congressional franked mail was less than 3 percent of the total cost of carrying all postage-free mail, and I may add, only thirteen one thousandths of 1 percent of the total Government expense in 1931. The cost of carrying the franked mail of Members of Congress in 1931 was only one two-hundred-and-seventy-sixth part of the 1931 deficit. Or, to state the matter in a different form, only $1 in every $276 of the 1931 postal deficit is chargeable to the congressional frank, and only $1 in every $8,000 of Government expense goes for carrying congressional franked mail.

While we should eliminate waste in the Post Office Department, we should not stop there. We should purge the other Departments of their extravagant habits. There should be a general housecleaning.

On several occasions in discussing Government expenses, I have stated in this Chamber that there are in the Government service probably 100,000 persons who perform no necessary service, and whose separation from the Government pay rolls would not in any substantial manner impair the efficiency or usefulness of any Government agency.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been one of the most expensive and extravagant Government agencies. It has sent men all over the world and into every State in the Union, ostensibly to develop trade and commerce and find a market for the products of our mills and factories.

These high-powered salesmen, these ambassadors of big business, these high-salaried agents of our highly protected American industry achieved no substantial results, and the sum total of their accomplishments did not justify the enormous sums expended for this service.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does the gentleman know that in the recent economy bill we enacted into law, all of these officers and employees in the Foreign Service, to whom the gentleman refers, these traveling salesmen for big business, are exempted from any cut whatever, and that many of these officers receive as much as $17,500 per year plus housing and other allowances?

Mr. LOZIER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution to the subject I am endeavoring to discuss. The make-believe administration of the Department of Foreign and Domestic Commerce by Julius Klein was not creditable to the Hoover administration, and his accomplishments were negligible. He was prodigal in his claims and promises but scant in performance. This expensive and unprofitable governmental agency should be overhauled and its expenditures radically curtailed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that two gentlemen have risen to move to strike out the word "gasoline", and that neither one has referred to it.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say in conclusion, that while I think the expenses of the Post Office Department should be reduced, I do not want the Congress or the country to stop there. Radical economies should be applied to every department, bureau, board, or commission of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The President is authorized during the period ending June 30, 1934, to proclaim such modifications of postage rates on mail matter (except that in the case of first-class matter the rate shall not be reduced to less than 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof) as, after a survey by him, he may deem advisable by reason of increase in business, the interests of the public, or the needs of the Postal Service, and such modifications shall be in effect on and after such date as he shall proclaim and until July 1, 1934. In case a modification of the rate of postage on first-class matter is proclaimed, the President shall also make a corresponding modification in the percentages of gross postal receipts specified in section 1001 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1932 as amended by this act, which percentages shall be in effect during the period such modification of the rate of postage on first-class matter is in effect. Nothing in this section shall be construed as giving the President authority to change the rate fixed by law on first-class matter mailed for local delivery, postal cards, and private mailing or post cards.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Strike out sections 2 and 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Subsections (a) and (c) of section 1001 of the Revenue Act of 1932 are hereby repealed, to take effect on the thirtieth day after the date of the enactment of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds the gentleman from Pennsylvania that section 3 has not yet been read.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. After section 3 is read, would it be in order to move to strike out both sections 2 and 3?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Chair holds that the gentleman can move to strike out section 2 at this time, and a motion later would be in order to strike out section 3.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out of it section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Subsections (a) and (c) of section 1001 of the Revenue Act of 1932 are hereby repealed, to take effect on the thirtieth day after the date of the enactment of this act."

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment that I have introduced in lieu of section 2 as carried in the bill, is section 2 of the measure introduced by the chairman of the committee, Mr. DOUGHTON. He introduced that measure on March 17. He introduced this present bill on April 17. I am appealing from Chairman DOUGHTON of April 17 to Chairman DOUGHTON of March 17 and ask this House to approve that previous declaration. There ought not be any doubt about what will happen when this 2-cent rate is put into effect. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] announced that the present expert of the Post Office Department came before the Ways and Means Committee yesterday and stated that if we took 1 cent off the local first-class letters it would reduce the revenue by $17,000,000.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. He said "based on the present volume."

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Based on the present volume. That is what I am stating. That means that in local letters at the present time there are 1,700,000,000 letters. Now, he said if we take the extra cent off nonlocal, that would reduce the revenue by $60,000,000. That means he is counting the present volume of nonlocal letters as 6,000,000,000 pieces of mail matter.

Let us put those two together and see where we are. One billion seven hundred million local and six billion of nonlocal means that the present expert of the Post Office Department is counting a volume of 7,700,000,000 letters altogether.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I feel the gentleman wants to be accurate in his statement.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] may have made that statement to which the gentleman refers, but, if so, he was in error. What the gentleman from the Post Office Department told us was that, taking the 9 months of fiscal year 1933 and estimating for the coming 3 months, we would have an increase of $60,000,000. The expert from the Treasury did not say if we reduced it to 2 cents there would be a loss of $60,000,000.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. He said the volume would be such that we would lose $60,000,000.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. No. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The expert did not make that statement.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Wood was the expert?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to say there would be a loss of $60,000,000 by a 1-cent reduction. In any case, the present volume of letters is not far from 8 billion instead of the 13 billions of 1932.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is the effect of the gentleman's amendment to restore the old flat 2-cent rate throughout the country?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is it exactly; and that will be simply and concisely done by those three lines. Thirty days after the passage of this act the universal rate in the country will be 2 cents. There is not a Member on the floor of this House who has not had letters from constituent business men pleading with him to help restore immediately the 2-cent rate. I doubt if any Member has sent back a letter to that constituent saying he would ask the President to reduce it to 2 cents.

Here is an opportunity now today to do what almost everyone of us, I feel sure, believes should be done immediately, and that is to restore the former rate, which has built the Post Office Department into the greatest postal organization of any country in the world. That rate was established in 1885 when there was a deficit of $8,000,000,000 in the Post Office Department, and, like magic, the business of the Post Office increased and the revenue came rolling in. What better can this Congress do today than to notify the country that we propose to do our constitutional duty and fix this postage rate as it should be fixed, and if there is any credit going to anybody for it—if there is going to be any wave of popularity in the country because of such action—let the House of Representatives get its part of the credit which is due for performing its constitutional duty. I believe it will bring a thrill of gratification to every business enterprise. I believe it will bring more money into the Treasury than the present rate. It will increase the revenues, decrease the deficit, and be the kind of action which the country expects this Congress to take. All that is necessary is to pass this section as introduced by Chairman DOUGHTON a month ago and send it to the Senate as coming from the House of Representatives, which deals with revenue. That will strike out this nongermane proposition about second-, third-, and fourth-class rates, and rectify at the same time the most unjust provision carried in the tax bill as to postmasters' salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Subsection (c), to which I have referred, is the section providing that postmasters get 85 percent of the revenue under the 3-cent postage rate. On the statement of the Department, that we would get $134,000,000 additional on account of the increased rate, it was enacted that the postmasters could count only 85 percent of receipts in counting their compensation. The truth of the matter is that the 3-cent rate has cut the revenues in the post offices. Now, 85 percent means that in many cases they are relegated to a lower-class post office. For instance, a second-class post office must have $8,000 receipts. Here is a post office with $8,200 receipts for the calendar year 1933. Under the provisions of the tax bill they can only count 85 percent, and they, therefore, go into third class. Every clerk in the office loses his civil service and his retirement status and becomes an employee of the postmaster at any figure that may be set if there is a job at all. Let us rectify that injustice at the same time we establish the 2-cent rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I just want to call the minds of the Membership back to the course we are pursuing. I think we have all seen where there was a proposal to reduce expenditures in the Government something slightly over a billion dollars in the next fiscal year. It is the hope that if this much economy can be accomplished it will not be necessary to inflict upon the country any new taxes or any increase in the present tax rate. If we can accomplish this under the distressing conditions we have in this country, I feel there is no community or hamlet in this country in which our action will not meet response, which will be of the most hearty approval.

Last year the Under Secretary of Treasury, Mr. Ogden Mills, came before the Ways and Means Committee in February, I recall, as the one to whom we had a right to look as the leader in a proposal for revenue legislation.

After he had surveyed the field and resurveyed the field, he finally came to us with a suggestion that we might accomplish an increase in revenues by an increase in the postal rates from 2 cents to 3 cents. This was accepted by the Committee on Ways and Means, accepted by this Democratic House without any appreciable dissent anywhere from either party.

The country objected seriously, as we expected it would, to the tax on checks, the tax on electric power to be levied upon the consumer, and the increase in postal rates. Well, there is not a man in this House who has not promised that at the first opportunity he would do his best to relieve these particular burdens, which we all acknowledge them to be.

Mr. Chairman, I say frankly we are facing a condition and not a theory.

One of my friends said to me a moment ago, "Let us get rid of the tax on checks, let us get rid of the electric-power tax." I said, "All right, I will go down the line with you whenever we can, but what are you going to substitute for them?"

What is proposed in this bill? Oh, we never heard of any bills originating or being recommended anywhere, until the President's proposal, reducing the postal rate from 3 cents to 2 cents. The administration comes in and recommends to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], that in place of his bill we take the initial step and reduce the drop-letter rate, which means local letters, letters on rural routes, letters to the patrons of any post office, that we take this initial step and reduce the postal rates on such letters to 2 cents.

Then what do they ask? They ask of you power to make investigations to see if an adjustment can be made, a leveling process, if you please, may be instituted, whereby they can determine the feasibility, or the practicability of reducing all first-class rates to 2 cents.

So today you have a proposition suggested to you for the first time in the shape of legislation by the administration, that you take this initial step and reduce the rate on drop letters to 2 cents, then let them institute these investigations and see if it is right and proper that the remainder of this 3-cent postal rate be reduced.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If we grant the President power to reduce postal rates, will he increase the rates on second- and third-class matter to put these classes of mail on a paying basis?

Mr. RAGON. If I did not think he would do that, I would not vote for this bill. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is utter folly to think of giving a man this power when he does not intend or expect to use it.

Now, adverting to a statement I made earlier today, I did not think when we gave the President the power to handle veterans' compensation, for instance, that he would go as far as he did. I do not believe 1 man out of 10 thought he would go so far. I thought he would go farther than we dared to go, and I know he will go farther under this bill than we dare to go now, brave and courageous as we may sometimes think we are.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. CROWTHER. I judge from what the gentleman said a few moments ago in his previous speech the intimation was that Congress was afraid of the newspapers. I believe the gentleman now intimates that the President is not afraid of them but Congress is afraid of the newspapers.

Mr. RAGON. Does the gentleman for a minute think we are not?

Mr. CROWTHER. I would vote for an amendment against the newspapers.

Mr. RAGON. Certainly. Yes; "Who killed Cock Robin?" But what will you do when it is time to function? The gentleman's party has been in power here for 12 years, yet they never attempted to do a thing about it. Explain that! [Applause.] Oh, you are brave now, as brave as a lion! The gentleman would do certain things, yes; but he never has nor never will.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me at this point?

Mr. RAGON. Let me state that the best proof of the pudding is the eating thereof. You have been tested.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. CROWTHER. Let me say to the gentleman that when we had a bill on our side giving this same kind of authority to the President of the United States one of your Members stood in the well of the House and declared it was too much power to confer upon any man in a democracy or in a republic. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. I grant you it is too much power to confer upon some of the recent Presidents we have had. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not think this statement comes with very good grace in this moment of victory. The gentleman should not exult in this manner. Your race is not run yet; your race is not run, and you may have a President that some other people will discredit as much as was attempted by Charlie Michaels and Raskob in this last campaign. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Do not take up all of my time. There is one thing about the Republican orators—when they run out of soap they always bring in Johnnie Raskob. Let me tell you something: If you want to know whether a fellow is hurt or not, watch to see whether he hollers when the other fellow hits him. When the gentleman from New York runs out of something to say in argument he thinks it makes a Democrat very mad to cry something back about Johnnie Raskob. Well, when I look at the cleaning that Johnnie Raskob gave you fellows since 1928 I do not blame you for hating him [applause], because when we took over the thing we did not have enough votes over here, if they had been of paper, to wad a shotgun, but now look over on the Republican side at that shriveled array.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I ask you Democrats here on this side to not fall a victim to our wily Republican brethren. They would not while still in power reduce the rate to 2 cents. Even from their President no recommendation came for such a reduction, and now when a Democratic administration undertakes to accomplish at least a part of the reduction, what attitude do they take? It is their old game.

This is their old game that they have practiced from Maine to San Diego, Calif., but they usually reserve it for political display on the stump and not for legislative halls. They come in here now and undertake to go you one better and say we want the 2-cent rate applied to everything. If this is true, why did not your President, who has just recently gone out of office, say that he wanted it, or what is better, why did not your famous Postmaster General, Mr. Brown, say something about it? Oh, no; when the Democrats come in here and undertake to do something, then my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] and my friend from New York the minority leader, and my other friend from New York, Dr. CROWTHER, come in here and say, "We are not going to let you Democrats run off with the bone; we will throw a Mother Hubbard over it and keep you from taking it off." [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 85, noes 165.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 88, noes 163.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 1001 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a colon and the following: "Provided, That for experimental purposes, such additional rate shall not apply on or after July 1, 1933, to first-class matter mailed for local delivery."

(b) The first sentence of section 1001 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended, effective July 1, 1933, by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a comma and the following: "except that in the case of such post offices as have city or village letter-carrier service 90 percent of the gross postal receipts shall be counted for such purpose."

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: On page 2, line 21, after the word "after", strike out "July 1" and insert in lieu thereof "May 15."

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that the fiscal year closes on June 30 of each year, and that this amendment does go to the matter of the fiscal policy of the Government.

However, may I say to you that, in the first instance, it does not in any way change the fundamental structure of the bill, and to you on this side of the aisle, I need only recount what has transpired here today, that we are practically in accord on the principle of the bill itself. In other words, we seek by this legislation to change now, as a matter of emergency as we call it, the rates on drop letters or the local postage rates from 3 cents to 2 cents and, eventually, we hope an investigation will disclose the need for a change in all first-class postage rates from 3 cents to 2 cents.

First of all, I have offered the amendment on the basis of the argument presented here today. You say in this paragraph that it is experimental and, secondly, you say that it is an emergency proposition and, thirdly, we are all agreed that we want to change the situation and reduce the postage rates from 3 cents to 2 cents.

If there be an emergency and if this be an experiment, let us not wait until July 1, but put it into effect on May 15. If it is good, as you think it is, let us find out what the results will be, and not wait until July 1, but put it into effect on May 15, so that we may know the results of our so-called "experiment."

May I again call your attention to the fact that it does not change the fundamental basis or the fundamental structure of the bill. I hope the majority may see fit to accept this amendment, because I want to immediately put the 2-cent postage rate into effect. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail. I would have no objection whatever to the purpose the gentleman has in mind accomplishing, but the Post Office Department has informed us that this would very seriously interfere with their accounting system, and I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Effective 15 days after the date of the enactment of this act, section 620 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 620. TAX-FREE SALES

"Under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, no tax under this title shall be imposed with respect to the sale of any article—

"(1) for use by the vendee as material in the manufacture or production of, or as a component part of, an article enumerated in this title;

"(2) for resale by the vendee for such use by his vendee, if such article is in due course so resold;

"(3) for resale by the vendee to a State or political subdivision thereof for use in the exercise of an essential governmental function, if such article is in due course so resold.

For the purposes of this title the manufacturer or producer to whom an article is sold under paragraph (1) or resold under paragraph (2) shall be considered the manufacturer or producer of such article. The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) shall not apply with respect to tires or inner tubes or articles enumerated in section 604, relating to the tax on furs."

(b) Effective 15 days after the date of the enactment of this act, section 601 (c) (1) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, no tax shall be imposed under this section upon lubricating oils sold to a manufacturer or producer of lubricating oils for resale by him, but for the purposes of this title such vendee shall be considered the manufacturer or producer of such lubricating oils."

With the following committee amendment:

"(c) Effective 15 days after the date of the enactment of this act, section 621 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by inserting after paragraph (2) thereof the following new paragraph:

"'(3) To a manufacturer, producer, or importer in the amount of tax paid by him under this title with respect to the sale of any article to a dealer, if the manufacturer, producer, or importer has in his possession such evidence as the regulations may prescribe that (a) such article has after the date this subsection takes effect been delivered by the dealer to a State or political subdivision thereof for use in the exercise of an essential governmental function and (b) the manufacturer, producer, or importer has repaid or agreed to repay the amount of such tax to the dealer or has obtained the consent of the dealer to the allowance of the credit or refund.'"

The committee amendment was adopted.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, after line 3, insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 5. (a) Effective on the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act, section 616 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'(a) There is hereby imposed on electrical energy sold for domestic or commercial consumption a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold.

"'(b) Effective on the fifteenth day after the date of enactment of this act section 616 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is repealed and section 616 (c) of such act is amended by striking out "any payment received for."'"

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is without merit. The preceding section of the bill deals with manufacturers' excise taxes. The proposed amendment deals with the excise tax on electrical energy. The amendment is therefore germane. It is in harmony with section 4 of the bill regulating other excise taxes. The amendment regulates the excise tax on electricity. The point of order is not well taken and should be overruled.

In the Revenue Act of 1932 Congress adopted a limited manufacturers' excise sales taxes. Under the terms of the act all of these taxes were levied and intended to be levied upon the manufacturer, the importer, or the producer. Among other taxes levied, there is a tax of 3 percent on electrical energy for domestic and commercial consumption.

Energy for industry was eliminated and the Members of the House who were Members of the Seventy-second Congress will recollect that unprecedented and unusual language was used with respect to the burden of the tax on electrical energy. In the conference on the revenue bill that tax was imposed on the consumer rather than upon the producer or distributor of electrical energy, although the House had imposed the tax upon the utility companies.

I call attention to the provision as to the tax upon electrical energy on consumers because it stands out as unprecedented and unusual language in the Revenue Act of 1932. I quote from section 616 relating to the tax for domestic or commercial consumption of electrical energy:

To be paid by the person paying for such electrical energy and to be collected by the producer.

I assert that that was a discrimination in favor of the utility companies against the consumers of the country. On all other articles the tax was to be paid by the manufacturer or producer.

Under my amendment I do not reduce any revenue. The amendment provides that the tax shall be paid by the utility companies—by the producers rather than the consumers. In my opinion this injustice to the consumers of the country ought to be corrected.

Inasmuch as I am in sympathy with the policy pursued by the majority at the request of the administration, I am not eliminating any taxes, but I ask that the amendment be adopted, so as to provide that this tax shall be placed where the burden of other manufacturers' taxes was placed last year when the revenue act was adopted—not upon the consumer but upon the producer.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MAY. It was adopted last year because it was in a conference report.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes; and Members of Congress had to vote for the conference report or not vote for any revenue bill at all. Here is an opportunity to correct a discrimination which the Membership of the House did not intend to place on the consumers of the country.

It was a discrimination against the consumers and in favor of the utility companies. I want to give the utility companies a fair deal, but it does seem to me that there was no good reason then to impose this tax upon the consumer, and there is a good reason now to put the tax where we intended it to be placed when the House imposed the tax.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does this exclude municipally owned plants or include them?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I stated in the beginning the amendment has no reference whatever to eliminating any tax at all. Personally, I should like to eliminate the tax from publicly or municipally owned plants, but the amendment simply transfers it, whether the plant is municipally or privately owned, from the consumers to the producers of electrical energy.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Is this the same rate that was fixed in previous legislation?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Absolutely. I make no change in the rate or in the tax. I have no disposition to interfere with the program of the Committee on Ways and Means. I am supporting the policy of the administration. This merely transfers the payment of the tax from the consumer to the producer. It makes no change in imposing taxes on either municipally or privately owned plants. In this respect the law remains the same as at present.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Under the gentleman's proposed amendment, can the distributor add this increased cost to his bill so that the consumer will ultimately have to pay it?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I simply seek to put the producer and the distributor of electrical energy in the same position that all other producers were put in under the manufacturers' excise sales taxes. It was intended that that tax should be largely absorbed by the manufacturer. In other words, the purpose of my amendment is to transfer this particular tax, the only one by name that we placed on the consumers, and leave it in the same category in which other manufacturers' taxes were left last year. Personally, I have no objection to a perfecting amendment, if anyone should think is desirable, to place in so many words the tax on the producer or consumer, but the clear intent of my amendment is to accomplish this purpose.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. How does the gentleman's amendment propose to handle the tax on commercial and domestic energy?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am making no change whatever in this respect in the existing law. I should like to improve the language of the bill of last year and eliminate the tax on domestic consumption. I stated in the beginning, and I repeat, that the purpose is not to change the amount of the tax, not to change the language or substance of the act with respect to the tax, but merely to transfer that tax from the consumer to the distributor or producer.

The gentleman from Kentucky is a member of the committee. The gentleman made the law. I simply adopt the language of the Revenue Act of 1932. I mean, of course, that the conferees on the bill made the terms and are responsible for the language placing the tax on the consumers.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I did not make it. I voted and spoke against the conference report which put the tax on the consumer.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. So did I.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And I introduced a resolution which was considered by the Ways and Means Committee, within 2 days after the tax bill went into effect, seeking to do what I know the gentleman wants done. It failed of passage in committee by one vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. There must be no misunderstandings. As I stated, if there is one thing that the American people understand and one thing that every Member of Congress understands, it is that the tax on electrical energy last year, in so many words, and by the use of the exact terms that I quoted a few minutes ago, was put on the consumer rather than on the producer and the manufacturer, and I am undertaking to make no distinction between utility companies and other manufacturers or producers. I am not undertaking to change the subject matter, but I merely undertake to correct that injustice that was done to the consumer and put the producer and the distributor of electrical energy in the same category in which we put all other manufacturers last year. That is the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. In the State of Washington we have a 3-percent gross tax on municipally owned utilities. This would add an additional 3-cent tax.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The amendment would not add any additional tax but would place the tax on the manufacturer or producer, whether publicly or privately owned. It does not change the law. The tax would be paid by the municipally owned plant if required to do so under the present law.

Mr. RAGON. The municipally owned plant would have to pay for it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes; and I say that the municipally owned plant and the privately owned plant ought to pay for it, and that the consumer should not pay the tax.

Mr. RAGON. But does not the gentleman think some study ought to be given to this very delicate question before we make this change?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I think the committee should study it, and I understand they have studied it. I think the committee should correct it on the first possible occasion. Now is the time for action. There is nothing delicate about the question unless Congress believes it delicate to tax utility companies instead of consumers.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman knows that we passed this gasoline tax at the last session and that it was killed in the Senate over this very matter. I say to the gentleman I think he is imposing something here that is dangerous to the successful passage of this bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I take no stock in such a contention. I cannot believe the Senate will defeat the bill at the command of the utility companies. At least I will not be deterred by the implied threat. This amendment was carefully prepared. I secured the services of Mr. C. E. Turney, of the Treasury, one of the advisers of the committee. He is associated with the Legislative Drafting Service, the purpose being to transfer the burden from the consumer to the utility company.

In extending my remarks under leave granted, I reiterate that the purpose of the amendment is to impose the tax upon the utility companies and upon the manufactures and distributors of electrical energy for domestic or commercial consumption. The amendment makes no change in the substantive law. Section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 imposes a manufacturers' excise tax of 3 percent upon electrical energy for domestic or commercial consumption. No tax is imposed upon the electrical energy used in industrial consumption. Personally, I oppose the excise tax on electrical energy for either domestic or commercial consumption. Certainly, I could see no justification for taxing electrical energy on domestic consumption. American householders are overburdened with taxes.

I may also say in this connection that, like many other Members of Congress, I opposed increasing the stamp taxes from 2 to 3 cents. I opposed the tax on checks, and I opposed the tax on gasoline. My opposition to the gasoline tax is that the States all levy gasoline taxes, and there must be a segregation of taxes for State and for national purposes. I think it is a mistake for the Federal Government to invade the field of taxing gasoline.

Under the pending bill, the tax on drop mail will be reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents. Personally, I trust that the President will very speedily authorize a reduction on all first-class mail matter from 3 to 2 cents. I believe that the Government will secure more revenue from 2-cent postage stamps than from 3-cent postage stamps. I realize that the bill is before the House at the request of the administration. I furthermore realize that if the tax on electrical energy, on bank checks, or on gasoline were eliminated, then other taxes would have to be substituted. The place for substantive changes in the bill is in the committee. Inasmuch as no practical suggestions for substitutes have been made, and inasmuch as the taxes on these subjects will expire by limitation on July 1, 1934, and inasmuch as the administration requests that these taxes be continued, I am supporting the substance of the pending bill, but the administration has never advocated the payment of the manufacturers' excise tax on electrical energy by the consumers. Hence, my amendment is not contrary to the policy of the administration.

As I have indicated, the Revenue Act of 1932 in levying manufacturers' excise taxes, imposes these taxes upon the manufacturer, producer, or importer. When there is a more specific statement as in the case of lubricating oils, coal, and lumber, the act specifically provides that the taxes shall be paid by the manufacturer, producer, or importer.

There is a tax upon tires and inner tubes sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer. There is a similar provision in the imposition of taxes on furs, on jewelry, on automobiles, on radio receiving sets, on mechanical refrigerators, on sporting goods, on firearms, on cameras, on matches, on candy, and on chewing gum. The language in the sections relating to these taxes is: "sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer." However, as I have pointed out, under section 616, when it came to the tax on electrical energy for the first and only time in the Revenue Act, in levying a manufacturers' excise tax, there is affirmative language placing the tax for electrical energy for domestic or commercial consumption on the person paying for such energy. As I have said, the affirmative requirement on the consumers was placed in the revenue act by the conferees on the Revenue Act of 1932. The Members of the House had voted for appropriations, much time had been spent upon the revenue act. It was apparent that the conference report would afford the only opportunity for levying additional much-needed taxes. Congress, under vigorous protest in both houses, approved the conference report. This is the first opportunity the House has had to correct the monumental error. I am seeking to correct it by eliminating from section 616 the language:

To be paid by the person paying for such electrical energy and to be collected by the vendor.

With this language eliminated, the amendment will impose a tax equivalent to 3 percent on the price for which so sold. The phrase "so sold" uniformly occurs in the manufacturers' excise taxes on the articles hereinbefore mentioned. The construction of the act places the tax upon the manufacturer or the distributor. In other words, the fair construction of the amendment places the tax upon the seller whether that seller be the manufacturer or the distributor.

As I have stated, I conferred with the Legislative Drafting Service and I adopted the language suggested by Mr. C. E. Turner of the Treasury Department, who sat on the floor as one of the advisors of the Ways and Means Committee and who has cooperated with the Legislative Drafting Service. I did not stipulate in the amendment after the word "sold" either the "utility company" or "the distributor." Without the limitation the person or institution selling must pay the tax. I would have no objection to a clarifying or perfecting amendment inserting the words "manufacturer, producer or distributor" after the word "sold" in the amendment. I maintain, however, that the language of the amendment provides for the transfer of the tax from the consumer to the producer or distributor. That is the intent of the amendment.

It has been stated that this matter should have been considered by the Committee on Ways and Means. I concur in that statement. My complaint is not at the want of consideration, but the want of action. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], stated that he introduced a resolution 2 days after the Revenue Act of 1932 went into effect, seeking to effectuate the purpose of my amendment. He further stated it had failed of passage in the committee by 1 vote.

I am not dealing with a new subject matter. I am not bringing up a question that has not been considered by the committee. I am asking the House to do what the committee has not done. I am not ignoring the committee. I recall, however, that it was the conferees of the committee who placed in the conference the burden of this tax upon the consumers. This is the first time there has been an opportunity to correct the discrimination in favor of the utility companies and against the consumers of the country. If the Ways and Means Committee refuse to remove the injustice, I submit that it is the duty of the House to support the amendment.

I have had some experience in legislation. I know the danger of amendments on the floor. I recall the debates on the conference reports on the revenue bill in the Seventy-second Congress. I remember it was stated it was difficult to phrase a requirement that would provide for levying the tax on the utility companies. That argument does not appeal to me. If conferees can adopt language that will impose the tax on the consumers, they can certainly impose a similar tax on the producers. Moreover, if the conferees and the Committee on Ways and Means cannot adopt the language to provide for imposing the tax, the House knows the difference between utility companies and consumers. It is the manifest duty of the House to place the tax where it intended to place it.

It was argued in behalf of the manufacturers' sales tax that it would be absorbed by the manufacturers. While in some cases, or in many cases, the tax may have been passed onto the consumer, the fact is that the manufacturers in the world-wide depression have generally reduced their prices. My information is that the utility companies have made no substantial reductions. The price of automobiles has been materially reduced. The radio receiving sets are much cheaper.

The existing law smacks of both favoritism and discrimination. The purpose of my amendment is to remove the discrimination and to eliminate the favoritism. The purpose of the amendment is to put the manufacturers of electrical energy in the same position as other manufacturers and producers whose products are subject to the manufacturers' excise taxes. I oppose the special favor boldly granted to the utility companies in the Revenue Act of 1932.

This is a revenue measure. It must go to the Senate. The Senate and the country will understand the purpose of the amendment. There is ample opportunity for any clarifying amendments that may be deemed necessary. Inasmuch as the members of the committee have pointed out no defects in the amendment; inasmuch as the language is clear; inasmuch as the amendment is brief; inasmuch as the purpose is evident, the weak contention by the members of the committee, who really favor the purpose of the amendment, should not prevail. The amendment should be adopted. The tax on electrical energy should be placed where Congress intended it to be placed when the Revenue Act of 1932 was passed. It should be imposed upon the utility companies and not upon the consumers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, as far as I understand the amendment, I would not oppose it, but this is not the time nor the place to consider it. I voted against the conference report on the revenue bill of 1932 because of this provision and the tax on bank checks and the additional postage charge. The gentleman must know, therefore, that I am somewhat in sympathy with his amendment. However, it is a very controversial question, and I think it should be brought up when the question of general revenue legislation is under consideration. If we adopt this amendment now hurriedly without understanding its full import and it goes over to the other body, it may delay this bill for a month. It may kill the bill. The bill extending the tax on gasoline was killed in the other body during the closing days of the last Congress just on account of this amendment. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment, and I assure the gentleman from Mississippi that at the proper time, when we consider revenue legislation, and when it can be thoroughly digested and understood, I shall be glad to consider it. This is the first notice the committee has had of the amendment. It was not brought to the attention of the committee, and I hope it will be voted down until we can have further time to discuss and consider it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is there any difficulty in understanding an amendment which simply provides that this tax must be paid by the vendor instead of by the consumer?

Mr. DOUGHTON. There are many questions to be considered in connection with it.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is it not a fact that when this question came up in the last Congress it was before the Ways and Means Committee for several weeks, and they debated that particular question, and this House voted against it and it was put on the consumer instead of the producer, in conference?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw the point of order?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina was recognized for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HASTINGS). The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. I suggest to the gentleman that the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] is correct. We also fought off of that bill the tax on checks. We also fought off, as long as we could, the increase in postal rates; but the check tax and the power tax and the gasoline tax were readjusted in the Senate. It has been the purpose of the Ways and Means Committee, as soon as we could, to get rid of those things. For that reason, to bring up something that carries 2 or 3 different classifications or rates, like municipally owned plants and privately owned plants and various things which enter into it, as the members of the committee will remember, a very complicated schedule of rates, I ask the chairman if he thinks it is practical for this to be catapulted into the rapid consideration of this bill, with nobody armed at all to make a proper report one way or the other?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I have grave apprehension that, if this bill goes to the other body with this amendment, it may endanger the bill. I am anxious to get this relief as far as the postal rates are concerned and to extend the tax on gasoline for the benefit of the Treasury, and do not want the bill delayed or endangered.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. With all deference, is that not the same argument that was submitted by the committee when we finally voted for the conference report? We voted on the theory that it would kill the bill. We have nothing but time to do the right thing at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. But not made for the same purpose nor by the same man.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that this is the only language that was in dispute?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It may be, in the gentleman's mind, but not in my mind.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What other language has the gentleman in mind?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, here is an opportunity to correct an injustice. Failure to adopt this amendment simply means you condone the offense. The conferees who brought the language complained of back to the House on the last revenue bill violated every rule of the House governing conferees. They wrote the language into the bill when it was in conference, despite the fact the language had not been adopted in the Senate nor was it adopted in the House. It placed upon the people of the country the burden of paying the tax on electrical energy when it was intended that it should be placed upon the producer. I say that here and now is the opportunity to get that tax back where it belongs, and take it off the people who are now paying it. Never mind about a later date, as suggested; if it is right, do it now.

In answer to the members of the committee who complain the last gasoline tax bill was killed in the Senate in the last session, let me say that there is a different Senate now; we have had an election, and if this language goes to the Senate of the United States it will be adopted, and if the wording is not absolutely correct, then it will be changed to suit the Treasury Department. I think the amendment will be satisfactory, but if it is not you know the Senate can change it. Let us place the issue before the new Senate and see what it will do.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MAY. How can the transfer of this particular tax on electricity from the consumer to the producer disarrange any revenue system or make any change in the revenues to the Treasury?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Some of it will be absorbed by the producer, if not all. You are aware that it was the intent originally to let the producer pay it. There was sufficient influence brought upon the conferees to change the language originally agreed to so that the burden was on the consumer. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have only a minute left. Please excuse me. I heard the gentleman's question before, and I say to the gentleman now, anticipating his question, change it in the Senate to meet the situation you complain of, but put this amendment on the bill now. This is the time to do it. Here is an opportunity to right a wrong. Let us not delay until a general revenue bill is brought in, for there is no telling when that will be. Do it now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WHITTINGTON) there were—ayes 138, noes 86.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. WHITTINGTON.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 153, noes 73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HASTINGS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BACHARACH. I am opposed to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BACHARACH moves to recommit the bill H.R. 5040 to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the bill back forthwith with the following amendment: "Strike out sections 2 and 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'Section 2, subsections (a) and (c) of section 1001 of the Revenue Act of 1932 are hereby repealed, to take effect on the thirtieth day after the date of the enactment of this act.'"

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 246, not voting 66, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. DOUGHTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COSTS OF TRANSPORTATION BY RAIL AND BARGE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include brief extracts from a speech delivered by Dr. Moulton, and also an Associated Press dispatch concerning rates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, about 10 o'clock on the night of March 25, 1933, Dr. Harold G. Moulton, president of Brookings Institution, delivered an address over the radio on the subject The American Transportation Problem. In this address, he gave answers to certain questions which had been received by him from various individuals and groups interested in the transportation problem.

One question and answer was as follows:

Question 5. You contend that river transportation is more costly than rail; but has not the improvement of the Ohio River been economically justified by the reduction in the cost of transportation which has resulted? (Member of chamber of commerce.)

Answer by Dr. Moulton. This is a very good question, because the Ohio River represents a completed project and is most favorably located. The test which I apply is to ascertain the costs borne by the taxpayers; add this to the cost borne by the shippers and compare the result with the cost of rail transportation. The inclusive cost by water is about 19 mills as compared with 7 mills on the competing Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad.

On March 26—the next day after Dr. Moulton's speech was delivered—the following Associated Press dispatch was given out at Pittsburgh:

PITTSBURGH, March 26.—The Pittsburgh Steel Co. is dispatching its first shipment to the Pacific coast via an all-water route tomorrow—in the latest move in the industry's battle for reduced railroad freight rates.

Two barges loaded with 1,200 tons of nails, wire, and pipe will start floating down the Ohio for New Orleans, to be reshipped through the Panama Canal by steamer.

Officials claim they will save $3 a ton net over the usual rail route to the Atlantic seaboard and reshipment by steamer.

The distance by the river from Pittsburgh to New Orleans is 1,951 miles. The distance by rail from Pittsburgh to Baltimore, the nearest Atlantic port, is 345 miles. The water haul on this shipment to the port at New Orleans was a little more than six times the distance of a rail haul to the port at Baltimore. The cost of this longer water haul was $3 per ton less than the cost of the shorter rail haul, assuming that the ocean rates from New Orleans and from Baltimore to the Pacific coast are the same.

But upon inquiry to the United States Shipping Board it will be found that the rate by ship on steel products from New Orleans to San Francisco—in carload lots—is 35 cents per 100 pounds, while from Baltimore to San Francisco it is only 32½ cents, a difference of 50 cents per ton.

If the ocean rate from New Orleans to the Pacific had been the same as that from Baltimore to the Pacific, then the saving on this shipment by river would have been $3.50 per ton, instead of $3 per ton as announced. In other words, the cost of this shipment by barge from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, a distance of 1,951 miles, was $3.50 per ton less than it would have been by rail to Baltimore, a distance of 345 miles.

If Dr. Moulton's address had been delayed 24 hours, he might consistently have changed his estimates as to comparative costs of transportation by rail and by water.

AGAINST RECOGNITION OF SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by Hon. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, against the recognition of Soviet Russia, delivered Tuesday night, April 18, 1933, at a great mass meeting held here in the Capital City at the Washington Auditorium under the auspices of the National Organization of the American Legion and a great many other recognized patriotic groups.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, against the recognition of Soviet Russia, delivered Tuesday night, April 18, 1933, at a great mass meeting held here in the Capital City, at the Washington Auditorium, under the auspices of the national organization of the American Legion and a great many other recognized patriotic groups.

THE BASIS OF LABOR'S OPPOSITION

Labor's opposition to the recognition of Soviet Russia by the United States rests upon a broad, deep, and unselfish basis. It has maintained a consistent attitude in holding firmly for the acceptance of the conditions and principles set up by President Wilson and approved by each succeeding administration as a prerequisite to Russian Soviet recognition.

The advocates of the recognition of Soviet Russia have shifted their positions. Originally they sought to influence public opinion with the argument that a de-facto government had been established in Russia and because said government had been recognized by most of the great powers throughout the world the United States should do likewise. Now, the advocates of Soviet recognition assert that recognition would mean that great material benefits would accrue to the people of the United States through the sale of manufactured goods, commodities and American products to the Soviet Government and the Russian people. The American people are asked to abandon the moral, spiritual, and ethical basis upon which opposition to Russian recognition originally rested and yield to the argument of materialism.

Some of the owners of industry as well as some of those who control our financial institutions have accepted this argument and have become the strongest advocates of the recognition of the Soviet Government. The appeal of selfishness and of profit was powerful to this group. They were willing to abandon principle for profit. Labor, however, refused to respond to such an appeal or be influenced by such an argument.

Labor holds that the preservation of the principles of self-government, the right to live unmolested, without the threat and menace of world revolutions, is of greater value than the creation of material wealth or the enjoyment of profits gained through the sale of goods to a foreign nation. Labor places our common heritage of our representative form of government, with its free institutions, above and beyond material values either in the form of an enlarged export trade or profits earned as a result of the ownership and management of industry. It would seem, in these days of distressing unemployment, that if the people of the United States were to be influenced in favor of the recognition of Soviet Russia because of materialistic reasons or the creation of work opportunities because of an enlarged foreign market that labor, instead of the owners of industry, would be the first to yield to such an argument. It is this attitude of labor which gives emphasis to the assertion that labor's opposition to the recognition of Soviet Russia rests upon a broad, deep, and unselfish basis.

To those who are familiar with the facts the economic argument in favor of the development of a potential market through Russian recognition carries no weight. Trading with Russia has been developed and carried forward with indifferent success. Russia bought goods from us without interference and on the same terms as goods were sold to the peoples of other countries. In 1931 the United States sold goods to Russia valued at $103,000,000. The figures show that the Nation's export to that country dropped to $12,500,000 last year. The highest point of the sale of goods to Russia was reached in the year 1931 even though our Government had maintained its steadfast opposition to the recognition of Soviet Russia. For this reason no one can allege that the reduction in sales of goods from $103,000,000 to $12,500,000 was due to the fact that the United States failed to recognize Soviet Russia. The probabilities are that this loss was caused by reason of the competition with goods manufactured in other countries at low wage rates or because more favorable credit facilities had been placed at the disposal of Russian buyers.

Trade relations with Russia can be greatly facilitated if American manufacturers are willing to sell goods to Russia on credit, and, in the light of the history of the Soviet Government, run the risk of having its obligations repudiated. The nation which will agree to give Russia a charge account, trusting Russian buyers for deferred payments, can increase its sale of goods in Soviet Russia regardless of governmental recognition. It is the fixed opinion of many representatives of labor that no increase in the sale of American-manufactured goods to Russia would be brought about because of recognition. Trade relations with any nation, recognized or unrecognized, must depend upon the operation of economic and financial laws. The nation which offers its goods at the lowest price and sells these goods on the basis of long-time credits will be favored in the establishment of any form of international relationship.

It is reasonable to suspect, because of the very costly experience which manufacturers and industrialists in Italy, England, and other countries have passed through in their economic and financial relationship with Russia, that American manufacturers are loath to sell goods to Russia on a charge-account basis. According to a recent press report the experience of manufacturers in Italy, while trading with Soviet Russia, has been very disappointing and unsatisfactory. An Associated Press dispatch, published on March 5, states:

"Italy's 2-year experiment of trading with Soviet Russia has ended in regret and a determination not to renew it. Her decision to denounce the preferential-duties section of the commercial treaty of 1924 and her refusal to renew the trade agreement are definite expressions of disgruntlement over the fact that Russia got the lion's share of the trading, and Italy is left holding the bag with half a billion lire in promissory notes. In the 2-year experiment Russia bought machinery, dyes, ships, airplanes, motors, tractors, marble, wine, and fruits sent in Italian bottoms. The ships brought back Soviet grain, oil, graphite, manganese, iron, steel, and lumber.

"At the end of the first year Italy found she had imported $29,000,000 worth and sold $14,000,000. In the second year the adverse balance was cut to $5,000,000.

"Moreover, Italy paid largely in cash. The Soviet paid mostly in credit, running from 9 months to 52 months. Most of this paper is still unliquidated, since the Bank of Italy will not rediscount it. The notes that have expired have been promptly paid. But the accumulation of paper when they want cash annoys the manufacturers.

"Lastly, the Soviet purchasing agents came to Italy and bargained with Italian manufacturers as competitors. The Italian purchasing agents could buy only through the Moscow Government and at set prices."

The bid for Russian recognition upon the basis of increased trade and the development of a potential market for the sale of American-made goods is not supported by the facts. I make the bold assertion that no profitable increase in trade with Soviet Russia can possibly follow governmental recognition. It is a false argument, alluring in appearance, and one which appeals to the material instinct of those who are willing to surrender principle for mere gain. It does not and will not influence labor.

There is another, more serious phase of trade relationship with Russia which must be considered and which is of tremendous importance to labor. It is a recognized principle in trade relationship that a buying nation must also be permitted to sell. That would mean that if American manufacturers sell goods to Soviet Russia, the markets of the United States must be open to the sale of Russian goods. We must buy from a nation to which we sell goods. Under ordinary circumstances nations exchange goods; but if such exchange would take place between the United States and Russia, American labor fully understands it would be compelled to compete with forced labor, controlled by a dictatorship. Labor in the United States does not welcome such an experience. The miners of the anthracite region of Pennsylvania and the men who work in the lumber camps of the Northwest have felt the effects which result from the sale of anthracite coal and lumber produced under conditions of labor existing in Russia which permitted the sale of these products in the United States at a price so low as to undermine the wage level established in the anthracite-coal regions and in the lumber camps of our Nation. The situation became so serious as to arouse the interest of the working people associated with the anthracite coal and lumber industries and as a result of their protests restrictions were imposed under the provisions of existing laws relating to dumping, unfair competition, and forced labor.

For some time a campaign of propaganda has been carried on in behalf of Russian recognition. Special writers for newspapers and magazines have portrayed the development of a potential market for the sale of American-made goods in Russia. They have distorted the facts in an effort to convince the masses of the people that Russian recognition offered a partial remedy for unemployment. The written articles prepared by a writer in Russia and published in one great metropolitan newspaper during the last few years can be considered as nothing more than pure Soviet propaganda. Thinking people are not influenced by an obvious distortion of facts.

At a number of annual conventions the American Federation of Labor has held that, in the opinion of the officers and members of the American Federation of Labor, subversive policies carried on by the Soviet Government in behalf of communism and in the promotion of world revolution must terminate before recognition of the Soviet Government could be considered or acted upon by the United States Government.

Labor holds that the Soviet Government is not entitled to nor should it be accorded recognition until it disavows its declaration of world revolution as made through the Third International. It seems inconceivable to labor that our own Government should recognize any government which had proclaimed to the world through a political or economic organization which it had created and controlled that its international policy was to overthrow the Government of the United States by force. The Soviet Government has never withdrawn nor modified that declaration. It is still a part of the political creed and the fixed policy of the Soviet Government. Its purpose is clear. Its intent is made plain. Its policy has been outlined. It is all directed against existing governments. Our own Nation cannot proceed blindly nor ignorant of facts. It must understand perfectly well that if and when it extends recognition to Soviet Russia, it is facilitating governmental and business intercourse with a government which had announced that world revolution was a part of its fixed policy. Is it asking too much to demand that the declaration of world revolution be disavowed and withdrawn as a condition to Government recognition? What type of American is he who would not insist upon the acceptance of such a proposal?

But it is stated by those who entertain an opposite point of view and who champion the cause of Russian recognition that the rulers of Russia can be trusted; that they will not carry out the declarations of the Soviet Government made through the Third International in favor of world revolution. It is alleged that that subversive doctrine has not been preached in the United States through the instigation of the Soviet Government. These advocates of Russian recognition state that Stalin, who is known as "the dictator" in Russia, will not inspire Communist propaganda, follow subversive policies, or promote world revolution. As a reply to this type of argument it is quite proper to ask, Shall the American people trust and believe the rulers in Soviet Russia who announced as their fixed purpose the overthrow of capitalism and capitalistic governments by force or the champions of Russian recognition who, in the United States, declare that these leaders will not do what they have proclaimed they intend to do?

Some facts we know. World revolution has been promoted in many countries in Europe, and Communists in the United States who receive their inspiration from Soviet Russia have declared that it is their avowed purpose to promote a revolution in the United States. There are many people who believe that the present plight of the German people is directly traceable to Soviet influence and Communist activities. Behold China, where the representatives of the Communists have been actively engaged! What a tragic and pitiful picture it presents! All nations and all governments where communism has gained the slightest foothold have felt the destructive influence of its development and growth. It would be easy to quote profusely from declarations made by the accredited representatives of the Soviet Government and of the Communist Party in Russia made through the Third International as evidence of the subversive policy originated and pursued in all nations by the Soviet Government.

The members of trade-unions in the United States clash with the Communists who seek to dominate and destroy the American trade-union movement. While certain representatives loudly proclaim their intent and purpose to refrain from engaging in destructive practices, their chosen representatives carry out instructions given them as opportunity and circumstance permit. The trade-unions must be constantly on guard in order to protect and preserve their organizations, their funds, their ideals, and their principles. It is not enough to say, in these trying days, that distressed and hard-driven unemployed workers are not susceptible to the beguiling influence of communism and communistic representatives. Surely, a government clothed with the responsibility of jealously guarding the safety of all its people cannot afford to expose its suffering people to the destructive philosophy preached and practiced by the Soviet Government. That is what our Government would do if it extended recognition to Soviet Russia, opened wide the doors of the Government to the establishment of Soviet headquarters and Soviet agencies in every city, State, and community throughout the land. No good purpose could be served and no interest in America could be benefited or advanced through the recognition of Soviet Russia under the present circumstances. To the contrary, we would be assuming a great risk by taking such a step. As in other nations, great injury might result from such governmental action.

All fair-minded people concede that the people of all nations, Russia included, may embrace and adopt such political philosophy as they may wish or desire. The Russian people have a perfect right to adopt the Soviet form of government and to administer their own political and governmental affairs free from interference by any other nation. In exercising this right of self-government, however, the rules governing international relations and international intercourse require that they respect and recognize the right of all other nations to do likewise. For one nation to seek to compel another nation to accept a political philosophy which is at variance with the thought, judgment, and traditions of its people is repugnant to our sense of justice.

While labor realizes that all is not well in our own land, and that there are many wrongs which must be righted, it believes that the instrumentalities of our representative government, provided for in our laws and our Constitution, offer the means by which the people can change governmental policy and our form of government as well. We claim the right to do this without interference from outside sources. Until the Soviet Government withdraws its avowed declaration to promote revolution and to overthrow our Government by force, the American Federation of Labor will vigorously oppose the recognition of Soviet Russia.

Upon this basis labor has taken its firm stand. The best and finest, as well as all that is sacred in our social, political, and religious life, call for the maintenance and observance of this position on the part of American labor. We know that there are other groups, strong in numbers, which stand with labor upon this great issue. We join hands and minds with these groups in protecting our Nation against a political philosophy which teaches violence and world revolution.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file minority views on Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE ARMS EMBARGO

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a letter by John Bassett Moore sent to the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 27, 1933.

The Honorable HAMILTON FISH, Jr.,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. FISH: Although I am unable to appear at the hearing on the so-called "arms embargo resolution" on March 28, I feel it to be my duty to write you a few lines on the subject. I will first state the objections to the proposed measure as it stands and will then point out how it may readily be made to conform to international law.

It will soon be 20 years since the outbreak in Europe of what eventually became known as the 'World War." Following that unfortunate event there developed, in the ordinary course of things, a war madness, manifested in the exaltation of force and the belittling of the enduring legal and moral obligations which lie at the foundation of civilized life. Peaceful processes fell into disrepute. We began to hear of the "war to end war"; and pacifists, enamored of this shibboleth, espoused the shallow creed that international peace could best be assured by the use of force or threats of force. We were told that preexisting international law had suddenly become obsolete and that the world had entered upon a new era in which the general tranquillity was to be maintained by "sanctions", by boycotts, and by war. But the final stage was reached in the spawning of the notion, now rampant, that peoples may with force and arms exterminate one another without breach of the peace so long as they do not call it war. This may appropriately be called the stage of bedlam. In all this, however, students of history will find nothing new. The development of such manias normally characterizes the progress of a great war, just as their decline marks the return to sanity.

To the final stage to which I have referred belongs the supposition that the law of neutrality no longer exists, and that in future there will be no more neutrals. It is on this theory that the proposed resolution is essentially based. It is true that the resolution does not in terms say so; and it is equally true that less is just now said about this phase of the subject than was said not long ago. But it is only on this theory that the sweeping terms of the resolution can be defended.

As a lifelong student and administrator of international law, I do not hesitate to declare the supposition that neutrality is a thing of the past to be unsound in theory and false in fact. There is not in the world today a single government that is acting upon such a supposition. Governments are acting upon the contrary supposition, and in so doing are merely recognizing the actual fact. In the winter of 1922–23 there was held at The Hague an international conference to make rules for the regulation of the activities of aircraft and radio in time of war. The parties to this conference were the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, and the Netherlands.

I had the honor to represent the United States in the conference and to be chosen to preside over it. We were able in the end to reach a unanimous agreement, which was incorporated in a general report. An examination of this report will show that it was largely devoted to the definition of the rights and duties of belligerents and of neutrals in time of war, and that it treated as still existing the Land War Neutrality Convention, the Convention for the Adaptation of the Geneva Convention to Maritime Warfare, and the convention concerning Neutral Rights and Duties in Maritime Warfare, all made at The Hague in 1907. The conference by which the report was adopted took place more than 2 years after the making of the Versailles Treaty and the Covenant of the League of Nations; the various delegations, it should be needless to state, acted under the authority and instructions of their respective governments; and yet, the idea that the law of neutrality had become obsolete never was suggested. So far as I am aware, not a single party to the Versailles Treaty or a single member of the League of Nations has ever actually taken the position that the law of neutrality is a thing of the past. The principal powers in the League have on occasion taken precisely the opposite position.

The fact is notorious that, after the Greeks were egged on to make war on the Turks and war actually came, Great Britain decided to remain neutral in the conflict, into which Canada and perhaps some of the other self-governing Dominions unequivocally announced that they would not be drawn without their consent. In other recent wars Great Britain has pursued a neutral course. Other governments have done the same thing. No government, so far as I am advised, has repealed its neutrality laws. Those of the United States still remain on the statute books; and, if they are to be repealed, it should be done directly and not by implication or by embarking on a lawless course in the name of peace.

We hear much today of the duties of the United States as a "world power", and the supposition seems widely to prevail that we have only lately reached that eminence. I am too good an American to think so poorly of my country and its achievements. The United States has always been a world power. It acted as a world power when, on the outbreak of the wars growing out of the French Revolution, its first President, George Washington, with Thomas Jefferson as his Secretary of State, proclaimed our neutrality. It acted as a world power when, some years later, it suppressed the activities of the Barbary pirates.

It acted as a world power when, in 1812, it went to war in defense of neutral rights. It acted as a world power when it proclaimed the Monroe Doctrine. It acted as a world power in extending its trade and opening up foreign countries to its commerce, as it so effectually did by peaceful processes during the Presidency of Gen. Andrew Jackson. It acted as a world power when it refused to permit the intervention of foreign nations in our Civil War. It acted as a world power when it forbade the further maintenance of the European empire set up in Mexico by French arms during our Civil War. It acted as a world power when, in the administration of President Grant, with Hamilton Fish as his Secretary of State, it brought about, through the greatest of all international arbitrations, the amicable settlement of the Alabama claims, and in so doing made a signal contribution to the further development of the law of neutrality. It is useless to continue the specification of instances. Nations, like individuals, may increase their power by combining with a due attention to their own business the extension of their friendly offices to brethren in trouble, and by conserving their militant resources for occasions when their vital interests are at stake. A nation that undertakes to meddle with every foreign disturbance is bound to become an international nuisance, to its own detriment as well as to the annoyance of other countries. Power is neither gained nor kept by such methods.

It is obvious that certain recent agitations have been and still are carried on under radically erroneous impressions as to the legal significance of the supply of arms and munitions of war to the parties to armed conflicts. The statement is often made that the trade in contraband is lawful, and the statement is also often made that such trade is unlawful.

These statements may seem to be conflicting; but, when properly understood, they are both correct. Because there is much dispute as to what the term "contraband" includes, and because it has so far been deemed proper to limit the burdens to which a neutral power is subject, international law has not up to the present time required neutral governments to prevent their citizens from manufacturing, selling, and shipping contraband, including arms and munitions of war, in the regular course of commerce. Hence, in the sense that a neutral government is not obliged to suppress such trade, the trade is lawful. On the other hand, however, international law recognizes the right of a party to a war to prevent such articles from reaching its adversary, and, if it seizes them, to confiscate them. In other words, international law, treating the trade as being, in an international sense, intrinsically unneutral and unlawful, permits the parties to the struggle to inflict the penalty, and to this the trader's government cannot object. The trader conducts the business at his peril.

But, while a neutral government is not obliged to suppress the contraband trade of its citizens, it is forbidden itself to supply contraband to a belligerent, and particularly is forbidden itself either to sell or to give to him munitions of war. Neutrality, in the legal sense, embraces not only impartiality but also abstention from participation in the conflict (Moore, Digest of International Law, vol, 7, sec. 1288, p. 863). The prohibition of the neutral government itself to supply arms and munitions of war is based upon the unquestionable fact that the supply of such articles to a fighting force is a direct contribution to its military resources, and as such is a participation in the war; and, if a government does this, it virtually commits an act of war. If it does this in behalf of one of the parties, it abandons its neutrality and is guilty of armed intervention; and if it does it for both parties, although it may be said to be impartial, it does what neither of the parties themselves can do, namely, fights for each against the other. It is not long since the United States became, through an inadvertent failure to observe these elementary principles, involved in an unfortunate incident affecting a great and friendly American country, the Republic of Brazil. Happily the intervention quickly ended, as the government in behalf of which it was committed abruptly disappeared, and in a few days we duly recognized its successor, as 15 other governments promptly did.

From the elementary principles of international law above set forth it necessarily follows that, if a government bans the shipment of arms and munitions of war to one of the parties to an armed conflict and permits it to the other, it intervenes in the conflict in a military sense and makes itself a party to the war, whether declared or undeclared.

The pending resolution is, I do not hesitate to affirm, opposed to the settled policy and the highest interests of the United States and also to the provisions of our Federal Constitution. If adopted, it would enable the President (1) to make international engagements of the most far-reaching kind at his will, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and (2) to carry us into war without the prerequisite constitutional declaration of war by Congress. Perhaps it may be answered that by the proposed resolution the Senate would voluntarily abdicate its constitutional powers regarding international engagements, and that the Congress would likewise abdicate its constitutional powers regarding the declaration of war. This argument might be accepted if the Senate and the Congress could constitutionally divest themselves of their constitutional powers and commit everything to the Executive. But, as they were unwilling to do this during the so-called "World War", when it was proposed to give the President complete dictatorial powers, I can only suppose that the present extraordinary agitation is due to the misleading and somewhat deafening clamor of those who, in the name of peace, would confer upon the President an unlimited right to engage in hostilities.

I refrain from saying an unlimited right to make war only out of deference to the profound and learned authorities who assure us that war can be abolished either by calling it peace or by refraining from calling it war. This is, I may remark, a favorite notion with those who demand that the Kellogg pact shall be equipped with "teeth" in order that it may masticate alleged "aggressors", and otherwise benignantly bite and gnaw its way to universal peace and concord. Unfortunately, there are many who appear to have been infected with these confused notions, which have been so industriously propagated in the United States. But, judged by the course of the principal members of the League of Nations during the past 10 years, and by their attitude toward the hostilities lately in progress in the Far East and elsewhere, such notions appear never to have had any real charm for the responsible authorities of the countries which would have been required to make the chief sacrifices in blood, in treasure, and in tears. To say this is not to impeach their wisdom or their sincerity. It may merely indicate that, having had enough of war, they long for real peace and an opportunity to recuperate.

Should the proposed measure become a law, no gift of prophecy is required to foretell what will follow. Groups moved by interest or swayed, consciously or unconsciously, by propaganda will clamor at the White House and at the Department of State for the unneutral application of the ban in favor of those whom they like or approve and against those whom they dislike or disapprove. We are assured that we may trust our authorities to resist such importunities, and to refrain from doing things that would involve the country in trouble. In other words, we are told that our authorities may be relied upon to refuse to exercise the powers so sweepingly conferred upon them. This is indeed a singular argument. Couched in the language of irresponsibility, it is not only self-stultifying but also unjust. The burdens and cares resting, especially at the present juncture, upon those who administer our affairs are already grave and harassing enough, without imposing upon them the pastime of playing with war. Within the terms of the pending resolution, our Government would be asked to set itself up in rash and arrogant judgment upon the acts of other nations and on the merits of their conflicts, with a view to give or to permit military aid to one as against another.

Before committing ourselves to this presumptuous program spun of the wild and flimsy fantasy that when nations fall out and fight, the question of the "aggressor", which still baffles students even of ancient wars, lies upon the surface of things, and may be readily, safely, and justly determined by outsiders, of whose freedom from individual interest or bias there is no guaranty, we should reflect the fact that had such a notion heretofore prevailed we might and in all probability should ourselves have been the victim of it. As a marshaling of all the incidents would unduly prolong this letter, I will call attention to only two.

During our Civil War we were more than once menaced with the possibility of intervention, and, had it taken place, no one can say how fateful would have been the consequences. But, as an American, I share with my fellow countrymen, as members of a great and united people, the universal sense that it is well that we were not permanently divided.

On April 6, 1898, there assembled at the White House the diplomatic representatives of six great European powers, who made in behalf of their governments what was called "a pressing appeal to the feelings of humanity and moderation of the President and of the American people in their existing differences with Spain." We need not question the motives of the governments by which this remonstrance against our armed intervention was made. The President of the United States did not question their motives in his answer; but, with the conscious dignity that became himself as well as his great office, he expressed the confident expectation that the remonstrating powers would equally appreciate the effort of the United States "to fulfill a duty to humanity by ending a situation the indefinite prolongation of which had become insufferable." Two weeks later the Congress of the United States adopted a resolution under which the Government intervened with arms. The governments that had remonstrated against this step evidently did not regard Spain as the aggressor in the unhappy controversy between that country and the United States. The implication was clearly and directly to the contrary; and, according to the theory on which the pending resolution rests, the remonstrants, when the United States forcibly intervened might appropriately have declared an embargo upon the shipment of arms and munitions to this country, while continuing to supply Spain with the implements of war.

All this might, on the new theory, have been done in the name of peace; and if the United States had exhibited resentment, this might have been treated only as further proof of its malevolent and aggressive disposition. It is better to reflect on such things while the opportunity still exists. It would be inexcusably short-sighted to assume that what has happened before will never happen again. We might also remember that our war for independence was treated by the great majority of powers merely as an act of rebellion against lawful authority. We waged the War of 1812 in support of disputed claims of national right. Many of our own people, including General Grant, have condemned our war with Mexico as an unjust aggression; but I am not aware that any of them has taken the ground that the general interest or the cause of peace would have been advanced if the powers of the world, some of which were not then themselves above suspicion, had combined their forces to oppose or to crush us.

If the real purpose back of the pending resolution is simply to prevent the United States from furnishing implements of war to those who are engaged in armed strife, this may readily be done by providing for a comprehensive, nonpartisan embargo on the shipment of arms to all countries engaged in armed strife, whether international or civil. Such an embargo would naturally be announced and imposed by public proclamation. Of this no foreign power could complain. There are already various countries which, in accordance with their laws, impose such a ban. This is entirely proper under international law. Whether such an inhibition would, without the cooperation of all other neutral nations, tend to limit the area, the destructiveness or the duration of wars is a conjectural matter on which I do not now undertake to pass. Nor do I intend to discuss the question how far such a policy may tend to render weaker nations, financially unable to maintain munitions factories of their own, incapable of asserting or of defending their rights against larger powers. Considerations such as these lie within the domain of policy. The general bans, where they exist, are based upon the belief that, as the supply of arms and munitions constitutes a military aid, it is better and safer to forbid it altogether. In imposing upon itself such a restriction a nation acts within its undoubted rights, and gives no just cause for reproach.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN BASSETT MOORE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I was detained and was not here when my name was called on the roll. If I had been present, I would have voted for the bill.

I want to say that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported a resolution making effective the agreement between the United States and the State of New York with reference to the St. Lawrence power project. I find on consultation with the Chairman of the Committee on Rules that even if I introduce the rule I cannot get it up tomorrow because it has to lie over 24 hours. It was not my desire to call it up Saturday. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be brought up tomorrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, not to interfere with other matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I object.

INVESTIGATION OF THE "AKRON" DISASTER

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Concurrent Resolution 15 and agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. If this consent is granted, will it interfere with the special order for tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from New York is to take up House Concurrent Resolution 15 and agree to the Senate amendment. That will not interfere with the special order for tomorrow. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the foregoing concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives with the following amendment, viz: Page 2, line 19, after "advisable", insert ", not exceeding $5,000, one half of said amount to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one half out of the contingent fund of the House."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KVALE. What is it about?

Mr. O'CONNOR. This is the committee to investigate the Akron disaster. The Senate amendment limits the expenses to $5,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Vice President, Washington, D.C.

SIR: I am herewith enclosing a certified copy of a resolution of the forty-fifth general assembly entitled "A joint resolution and enactment ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America relating to the President and Vice President of the United States and to the Congress of said United States and to the Members of said Congress", which resolution was ratified January 20, 1933.

Yours very truly,

CLYDE L. HERRING, Governor.

STATE OF IOWA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I certify that the copy hereto attached is a true copy of joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution and enactment ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America relating to the President and Vice President of the United States and to the Congress of said United States and to the Members of said Congress."

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Iowa, at the city of Des Moines, this 19th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] CLYDE L. HERRING, Governor

Attest:

Mrs. ALEX MILLER, Secretary of State.

Senate Joint Resolution 4 (by Myers)

A joint resolution and enactment ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America relating to the President and Vice President of the said United States and to the Congress of said United States and to the Members of said Congress

Whereas the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America, duly assembled, on or about the 3d day of March 1932, by a resolution duly concurred in by a constitutional majority of both Houses of said Congress, did submit to the legislatures of the several States of said United States for ratification a proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States of America; and

Whereas said resolution and proposed amendment is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"'ARTICLE —

"'SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified, and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"'SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President-elect shall have died, the Vice-President-elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President-elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice-President-elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President-elect nor a Vice-President-elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"'SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"'SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"'SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission'":

Now, therefore—

Be it enacted and resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America as set forth herein under sections 1 to 6, inclusive, of the said resolution of the said Congress is hereby ratified and consented to by the State of Iowa and by the general assembly thereof; be it further

Resolved and enacted, That copies of this enactment and resolution, duly certified to by the Governor of the State of Iowa and attested by the secretary of state of the State of Iowa, under the seal of the said State, be forthwith forwarded by said Governor to the Secretary of State of the United States, and to the Presiding Officers of each House of the Congress of the United States.

N. G. KRASCHEL,
Lieutenant Governor.
GEO. E. MILLER,
Speaker of the House.
BYRON G. ALLEN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved January 20, 1933.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
FIFTY-SEVENTH LEGISLATURE, REGULAR SESSION OF 1933.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 35, requesting legislatures of other States to memorialize the Congress of the United States to pass Senate bill No. 1197, known as "the Frazier bill", providing that existing farm indebtedness shall be refinanced by the Government of the United States

Whereas a crisis exists and hundreds of thousands of once-prosperous farmers in this Nation have already lost their homes and their all by mortgage foreclosures because of the fact that the price of agricultural products has for years been below the cost of production, a condition that affects all of the people of this Nation and is largely responsible for the continuance of the depression; and

Whereas there is no adequate way of refinancing existing agricultural indebtedness and the farmers are at the mercy of their mortgagees and creditors; and

Whereas unless immediate relief is given, thousands and hundreds of thousands of additional farmers will lose their farms and their homes and millions more will be forced into our cities and villages and the army of unemployed will necessarily increase to alarming proportions, precipitating a condition that threatens the very life of this Nation; and

Whereas the State Legislatures of Montana, North Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois have each and all memorialized Congress to pass Senate bill No. 1197, known as "the Frazier bill", without delay, which bill provides that existing farm indebtedness shall be refinanced by the Government of the United States at 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal on the amortization plan, not by issuing Federal Reserve notes the same as the Government now does for the banks through the Federal Reserve bank: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Michigan respectfully requests and petitions the legislatures of other States that have not already done so to memorialize Congress to pass Senate bill 1197 without delay, in order that the agricultural indebtedness of this Nation may be speedily liquidated and refinanced and agriculture saved from utter ruin and destruction and this depression brought to an intelligent and speedy end, and respectfully requests that the State legislatures cause copies of such memorial, after same has been passed, to be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, to Senator FRAZIER at Washington, D.C., and to WILLIAM LEMKE, Congressman, at Washington, D.C.

Adopted by senate, April 11, 1933.

Adopted by house of representatives, April 12, 1933.

DON W. CANFIELD,
Secretary of the Senate.
WRIGHT F. GRAY,
Clerk of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to restore to the Public Utilities Commission of the Territory of Hawaii jurisdiction over certain public utilities

Whereas there are a number of public utilities operating within the Territory of Hawaii, which are now, by virtue of certain acts of Congress, placed some under the supervision and control of the Federal Interstate Commerce Commission and some under the supervision and control of the United States Shipping Board: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii, regular session 1933 (the house of representatives concurring), That the legislature favors the passage by Congress of an act or acts to the effect that the existing control and jurisdiction of the Federal Interstate Commerce Commission and of the United States Shipping Board over public utilities operating in the Territory of Hawaii, shall, except so far as regards interstate commerce, be transferred to the Public Utilities Commission of the Territory of Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Hawaii.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T.H., April 6, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on April 5, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T.H., April 6, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on April 5, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNT,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to enact legislation, and the Bureau of Immigration of the Department of Labor of said United States to establish rules for the acceptance of Hawaiian birth certificates as prima facie evidence of birth in the Hawaiian Islands

Whereas under section 196 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1925, as amended by Act 202 of the Session Laws of Hawaii, 1927, the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii is empowered, whenever satisfied that any person was born within the Territory of Hawaii, to issue to such person a certificate showing such fact; and

Whereas the immigration officers of the United States decline to recognize the certificate so issued by the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii, but recognize only certificates issued by the immigration officers in charge at Honolulu, city and county of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, in accordance with subdivision E of rule 21 of the immigration rules of January 1, 1930; and

Whereas the certificates issued as aforesaid by the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii are issued only after an examination in every respect as thorough as that provided under the aforementioned immigration rule: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, urgently requested to provide, by appropriate and adequate legislation, for the acceptance by the Bureau of Immigration of the Department of Labor and all other bureaus and departments of the United States of such certificates of Hawaiian birth as prima facie evidence of the fact as set forth in such certificates of birth in the Territory of Hawaii or the islands now comprising said Territory, and that the Bureau of Immigration of said Department of Labor be, and it hereby is, respectfully requested, pending the disposition of this concurrent resolution by said Congress, to establish a rule authorizing and requiring members and agents of said Bureau to accept such certificates of Hawaiian birth as prima facie evidence of the fact as set forth in such certificates of birth within the Territory of Hawaii or the islands now comprising the same; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this concurrent resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Labor of the United States of America, and each of the two Houses of the Congress of said United States, and the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T.H., April 5, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on March 7, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNA,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T.H., April 5, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on April 5, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

Concurrent resolution

Whereas, under and by virtue of Act 210 of the Session Laws of Hawaii, 1927, the board of supervisors of the city and county of Honolulu and the sewer and water commission of said city and county have been authorized to prepare plans and estimate of cost of constructing a tunnel through the Koolau Range, beginning at the Kalihi-Honolulu side, at Kalihi, in close proximity to Fort Shafter, and running to Koolaupoko, Oahu; and

Whereas the construction of such project is now a question of imperative moment, not only for the relief of unemployment in the Territory of Hawaii, but more so from a military and strategic viewpoint; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill providing for a bond issue of $500,000,000 for the relief of unemployment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is respectfully memorialized to set aside and to be made immediately available from said bond issue the sum of $4,000,000 for said project, said amount to be expended by the territorial highway engineer upon plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States; and further

Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T.H., April 7, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on April 6, 1933.

HERBERT N. AHUNA,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, T.H., April 7, 1933.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on April 7, 1933.

GEO. P. COOKE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the American Manufacturers Export Association, New York City, favoring the prompt negotiation of reciprocal bargaining tariffs by the United States with foreign nations, looking toward the freer interchange of commodities mutually advantageous, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a petition and two letters in the nature of petitions signed by 37 citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for a senatorial investigation of alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate 7 memorials, 10 telegrams, and 13 letters in the nature of memorials, from 730 citizens and organizations in the State of Louisiana, endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, condemning attacks made upon him, and remonstrating against a senatorial investigation of his alleged acts and conduct, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary-treasurer of the Envelope Manufacturers' Association of America, embodying a resolution adopted by that organization favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution giving Congress the right to regulate the hours of labor and establish minimum-wage rates for all industries, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Associated Cooperage Industries of America, protesting against the passage of the so-called "Black-Connery 30-hour week 6-hour day bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the National Guard Association of the United States, by Claude V. Birkhead, its president, protesting against the proposed elimination of field training and also cuts in armory drills for the National Guard, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the West End Society, of Brooklyn, N.Y., protesting against the alleged mistreatment of Jews in Germany, and favoring the passage of necessary legislation permitting the immigration of German Jews into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens, being postal employees, of Oklahoma City, Okla., praying for the passage of a 30-hour week work bill for postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution adopted by St. Regis Local, No. 45, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, of Deferiet, N.Y., favoring the passage of legislation establishing a 6-hour day and 30-hour week for workers, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McCARRAN presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

STATE OF NEVADA,

I, W. G. Greathouse, the duly elected, qualified, and acting secretary of state of the State of Nevada, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true, full, and correct copy of the original Senate Joint Resolution No. 21, introduced by Senator Tobin on March 9, 1933, now on file and of record in this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of state at my office in Carson City, Nev., this 22d day of March A.D. 1933.

Senate joint resolution memorializing Congress to grant to forest users in the United States a moratorium of 2 years for the payment of grazing fees for the year 1932, and to omit charges for grazing fees for the year 1933

Whereas our great national depression has imposed a blow upon the livestock industry of the West that amounts to bankruptcy; and

Whereas livestock owners in many instances cannot pay their State and county taxes; and

Whereas many livestock owners are faced with the necessity of holding their stock under fence and upon land without feed thereon, because of the present depression they cannot secure the necessary funds to pay grazing fees; and

Whereas the possibility of securing the necessary funds through any of the Government agencies would be too late to save the situation, and if so obtained would only be borrowing from one department to pay another; and

Whereas we feel that imminent disaster is upon us unless relieved by a moratorium of at least 2 years on the grazing fees due for 1932, and the remission of all fees for 1933: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of Nevada, That we memorialize the Congress of the United States to take immediate steps to provide a moratorium of at least 2 years on the payment of grazing fees due from livestock men as users of the Government ranges for 1932, and a total remission of grazing fees for the year 1933; and be it further

Resolved, That properly certified copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to each of our Senators, and to our Representative in Congress.

Senate joint resolution memorializing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation to reduce the interest rate on, and to extend the time for payment of, agricultural and livestock loans

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of Nevada, That—

Whereas the present interest rates charged by the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation in the State of Nevada are excessive under present conditions and should be lowered to at least 4 percent per annum; and

Whereas said loans made are required to be approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Now, therefore

The Legislature of the State of Nevada hereby respectfully requests the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation to reduce the rate of interest on all pending agricultural and livestock loans and all future loans to at least 4 percent per annum, and to extend time for payment of the principal on present loans for an additional 3 years, and to make all future loans for not less than 3 years. The secretary of state of the State of Nevada is hereby directed to transmit certified copies hereof to the president or chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to the executive officer of the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation for this Federal land-bank district, and to the United States Senators and Representative in Congress from the State of Nevada.

Senate joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to speedily rehabilitate silver, and petitioning the President-elect to call an international conference on the subject

The restoration of silver to its natural parity ratio of 16 to 1, based on the ratio of world production of silver and gold, appears to be essential to sound and necessary expansion of the basic currency of the world. Such restoration appears to be the most feasible plan to increase the purchasing power of more than half of the population of the world, enabling them to buy products of the United States and other gold-standard nations. Such restoration appears to be a requisite in order to increase our export trade and the sale of our surplus production, now depressing our domestic market below the actual cost of production. No plan as yet presented would do more toward restoring the economic stability of the world than the realization of the facts: That silver is not even as much a commodity as is gold; that four fifths of the silver now being produced, and that ever has been produced, has been used for monetary purposes, while only half of the gold ever produced has been so used; that laws did not make money of either gold or silver; they were money long before any monetary laws were ever enacted; that since the beginning of time there has not been produced throughout the world on the average more than 15 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold, and that in 1932 there were actually less than 13 ounces of silver produced to each 1 ounce of gold; that monetary laws alone have artificially decreased the demand for silver through restricting its use as money, thus decreasing its relative value, and we must therefore now remove or neutralize these artificial restrictions before we may hope to restore the natural laws of supply and demand. Nevada therefore favors any and all legislation, whether national or international, tending to effect the rehabilitation of silver, but is informed and believes that the only bill introduced in the Senate and the House of Representatives during the last two sessions of Congress which has received a favorable report from any committee is that introduced by Senator PITTMAN for the purchase of American-produced silver with silver certificates, and this in all probability is the extent of legislation that could be enacted at the present session of Congress. And while some might be inclined to take nothing less than what they think is right, others are inclined to compromise upon the best they can get if it be a really forward step, particularly so when faced by an emergency which demands prompt alleviation. The Silver State therefore submits that said Pittman bill is a step in the right direction, will tend to offset the unnatural supply of silver now derived from the melting of Indian silver coins and at least to that extent will tend to restore the market for silver to the normal mine production and the normal world demand; whereupon, at subsequent sessions of Congress, when conditions may be more favorable for silver legislation, we may hope for amendment of the Pittman bill to enlarge its scope and effect. In 1897, Nevada vigorously supported the Federal act (29 Stat. 624) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint five or more commissioners to attend any international conference called by the United States or any other country with a view to securing by international agreement a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money, by means of a common ratio between these metals with free mintage at such ratio; and appropriating $100,000 for the expenses of any such conference. That act is still in full force and effect, but the conference has never yet been called, even though the Senate of the United States in adopting the Pittman resolution specifically requested the President to do so. The Silver State therefore respectfully urges and petitions the President-elect to call an international silver conference to be held in the United States at the earliest practical date.

Resolved, therefore, by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, That we memorialize the present Congress of the United States to enact the Pittman bill (S. 3606), and respectfully petition the President-elect of the United States to promptly call an international conference to rehabilitate silver.

Resolved further, That copies of this resolution be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of state of Nevada to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, to our Senators and our Representative in Congress, and a copy under the great seal of the State of Nevada to the President-elect of the United States.

Assembly joint resolution requesting Congress and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make immediate provision for relief of Nevada Indians

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of Nevada, That—

Whereas the Indians living on the Walker Lake and the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservations in the State of Nevada have presented resolutions to the Legislature of Nevada; and

Whereas in said resolutions it is made to appear that the Indians of the State of Nevada have been suffering from cold and hunger during this winter; that no work is to be had and no help is given to certain Indians by the Indian Affairs Bureau; that they have been refused help by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and by other institutions, who claim that Indians are wards of the Government, while, on the other hand, they have been told by Indian officials that certain Indians are nonwards of the Government; and

Whereas said resolutions request the Nevada Legislature to appropriate funds to relieve said Indians, and, if not possible, that said legislature recommend to Congress that proper provisions be made immediately for the said Nevada Indians; and

Whereas the financial condition of the treasury of the State of Nevada is such that it will be impossible at this time to make an appropriation out of the State treasury for said Nevada Indians: Now, therefore

The Legislature of the State of Nevada hereby respectfully requests the Congress of the United States and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to immediately make provision for the relief of the destitute Indians of the State of Nevada. The secretary of state is hereby requested to transmit certified copies of this joint resolution to the United States Senators and Representative in Congress from the State of Nevada, and the said United States Senators and Representative are respectfully requested to take immediate action in conformity with the purposes of this joint resolution.

Senate joint resolution relating to the Carson City United States Mint and Assay Office

Whereas the appropriation for the United States Mint at Carson City, Nev., for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, was discontinued by the Seventy-second Congress, which adjourned sine die March 4, 1933; and

Whereas the State of Nevada has during the period of more than 75 years last past produced more than $1,000,000,000 of mineral wealth for the benefit of the people of the Nation, and its mineral resources in precious and other metals will continue to contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the whole country if its further development is not hindered by adverse Federal legislation; and

Whereas there is and has been at Carson City, Nev., a substantial stone building erected by the Federal Government and known as the Carson City United States Mint, and which mint, beginning in the year 1870 and up to the year 1893, coined gold and silver money of a total value of $49,274,434.30; and

Whereas ever since the discontinuance of the coinage of money at said Carson City Mint the same has been used and conducted as a United States assay office for the purchase of gold bullion and making assays for miners, prospectors, and others at a small cost of about $6,500 per annum, out of which has been paid the compensation of an assayer in charge, assistant assayer, and watchman; and

Whereas by reason of the failure of the last Congress to make an appropriation for said Carson City Mint the same will necessarily have to discontinue and be closed on July 1, 1933; and

Whereas during the period of 6 years last past the United States Bureau of the Mint, Treasury Department, under which all mints and assay offices are conducted, has netted the Federal Government a profit of over $22,000,000; and

Whereas the continuance of said mint at Carson City is warranted for the convenience and benefit of the mining industry of the State of Nevada; and

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt has recently stated that there is need of an adequate supply of money in order to restore the economic condition of the country; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the Legislature of the State of Nevada that the Federal Government should increase the coinage of silver in order to secure an adequate and controlled inflation of money, and thus bring about a raise in commodity prices for the products of the farms and mines and other producers of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of Nevada, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to favorably consider recommending to the Congress the advisability of increasing the purchase and coinage of silver in order to provide additional basic money, and in this connection to also recommend that the Carson City Mint be equipped and reopened for the coinage of silver into money as well as for the purposes of purchasing gold and silver bullion and making assays of gold and silver bullion for the benefit of the mining industry of Nevada. The secretary of the State of Nevada is hereby directed to transmit certified copies of this joint resolution to the President, White House, Washington, D.C., and to United States Senators KEY PITTMAN and P. A. MCCARRAN and Representative JAMES G. SCRUGHAM.

Assembly joint resolution memorializing Congress to increase the tariff on copper

Whereas the production of copper in the mining regions of the United States is an industry furnishing employment to thousands of men, giving them the opportunity to support families to the credit of this Nation; and

Whereas copper is so extensively useful in the industries and sciences in our own Nation; and

Whereas the production of copper by cheap labor has presented a competitive condition with which our American people, by reason of American living standards, are unable to compete, thus throwing many thousands of industrious men out of employment and destroying the right of American families to exist in the manner and maintain American principles and ideals as contemplated by our Constitution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of Nevada, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to impose an additional tariff upon copper to the extent that the total tariff thereon may be 10 cents per pound instead of 4 cents as at present; and be it further

Resolved, That properly certified copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each of our Senators and to our Representative in Congress.

Assembly joint resolution memorializing Congress for the passage of legislation for the encouragement and relief of the mining of precious metals, gold and silver, and for the making of exception for payment of income tax on the proceeds of production of such metals

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of Nevada—

Whereas we are deeply cognizant of the persistent and consistent attitude and struggle heretofore made and maintained by our esteemed United States Senators, Key Pittman and Tasker L. Oddie, in the furtherance of the cause of silver, particularly with reference to stabilization of the value thereof, with a view of affording a more satisfactory economical basis to expand international trade with so-called "silver nations" of the World, and which in turn would result in the stimulation of prospecting and mining of silver within our State; and

Whereas no support has been given or afforded to the miner by the National Government in any manner to offset the pressing, prevailing increase of cost of mining for gold and silver; and that it appears that present world conditions charge our Nation with the duty of early action, internationally or individually, toward the restoration of silver to its former status prior to the demonetization thereof as a recognized medium of currency:

Therefore the Legislature of the State of Nevada urgently requests the present Congress and the national administration that early legislation be enacted to stabilize the price of silver for the encouragement of foreign trade with silver nations and countries not pledged to the maintenance of the gold standard, and that a defined policy be pursued which will eventually lead to the remonetization of silver to its former status prior to its demonetization in 1873; further

Resolved, That our representatives in Congress to convene after March 4, 1933, be, and they are hereby, urged to offer and support the adoption of an amendment to the internal revenue laws of the United States to exempt thereunder the proceeds of mines of the Nation engaged in the mining of gold and silver from the payment of any income tax to the Government upon gold and silver production. The secretary of state of Nevada is hereby instructed to transmit certified copies of this joint resolution to United States Senators KEY PITTMAN and PATRICK MCCARRAN and Representative JAMES G. SCRUGHAM.

Assembly joint resolution memorializing Congress not to pass H.R. 13558, relative to filing of notices of location of mining claims in United States land offices

Resolved by the assembly and the senate, That—

Whereas there has been introduced in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States a bill, known as "H.R. 13558", which provides for the filing of notices of location of all mineral claims in land offices of the United States, and that proofs of labor on such mining claims be similarly filed, in addition to filing requirements now required under State laws, and that in case of failure to so file in the United States land offices all claims for which such filings have not been made shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location had ever been made on said claims, and granting the Secretary of the Interior power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of the act and requiring the payment of such fees for filing all papers required to be filed under the provisions of the proposed laws; and

Whereas as almost all of the public lands within the State of Nevada are potential mineral lands and thousands of mining claims now located on them, or which may be hereafter located thereon, have not been and cannot be so described in the location notices, that these claims could be placed upon a map without a long, tedious, and expensive survey, much of the mineral land being as yet unsurveyed and unplatted, and as such claims are held by citizens or may be located by others who are unable to bear the expense of surveying them and paying the filing fees to be required, especially in the present economic condition of the country; and

Whereas the provisions of such proposed law by Congress are unjust and wholly unnecessary and would work great hardship upon the prospectors and owners of mining claims: Now, therefore,

The Legislature of the State of Nevada earnestly protests against the passage of said bill, namely, H.R. 13558, and requests that the Senators and Representative of the State of Nevada in Congress oppose said bill and vote against the passage of the same, and that the Congress of the United States take cognizance of this protest and defeat the passage of said bill. The secretary of state of the State of Nevada is hereby instructed to forward a certified copy of this joint resolution to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the United States Senators and Representative in Congress from the State of Nevada.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 1490) to authorize the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy to withhold the pay of officers, warrant officers, and nurses of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps to cover indebtedness to the United States under certain conditions; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 1491) granting a pension to Martin Suppan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LONERGAN:

A bill (S. 1492) authorizing the issuance of a special postage stamp in honor of Brig. Gen. Thaddeus Kosciusko; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 44) providing for the ratification of constitutional amendments by popular elections; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COOLIDGE:

A bill (S. 1493) for the relief of the Franklin County Trust Co., of Greenfield, Mass.;

A bill (S. 1494) for the relief of the Security Trust Co., of Lynn, Mass.; and

A bill (S. 1495) for the relief of the Springfield Safe Deposit & Trust Co., of Springfield, Mass.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 1496) for the relief of Nannie Swearingen; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 1497) for the relief of Jerry O'Shea; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 1498) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay E. C. Sampson, of Billings, Mont., for services rendered the Crow Tribe of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. STEPHENS:

A bill (S. 1499) to amend section 4530 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (S. 1500) authorizing pursers or licensed deck officers of vessels to perform the duties of masters of such vessels in relation to entrance and clearance of same; and

A bill (S. 1501) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea"; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 1502) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, as amended; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRINTING OF MANUSCRIPT "CONTRACTS PAYABLE IN GOLD"

Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 62), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Contracts Payable in Gold", by George Cyrus Thorpe, showing the legal effect of agreements to pay in gold, be printed as a Senate document.

"CROSS-QUESTIONS AND SILLY ANSWERS"—ARTICLE BY JOHN A. LOGAN

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article written by Mr. John A. Logan and published in the Edmonson News, of Brownsville, Ky., in the issue of Thursday, April 13, 1933, entitled "Cross-Questions and Silly Answers."

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Edmonson News, Brownsville, Ky., Apr. 13, 1933]

CROSS-QUESTIONS AND SILLY ANSWERS

By John A. Logan

1. A benevolent President and Congress provided 2,000,000,000 new dollars for the relief of depositors in banks but the Federal Reserve banks have this money locked in their vaults and neither the banks nor the people can get it. We are told, if we are a State bank, that we must first be examined by national-bank examiners and if we pass inspection, which we won't, and have "acceptable" collateral, which we ain't, we can get the money, which we can't.

"A servant ruleth."

2. A benevolent President and Congress provided millions of dollars for the establishment of Federal home-loan banks last October for the purpose of relieving the home owner who resided in cities, towns, and villages, yet these banks have never made a loan to a single home owner. They say they cannot loan direct to home owners, but operate only through building and loan associations and like organizations. They urge building and loan associations to become members of the Federal home-loan bank system, the first requisite being that the building and loan associations shall send them a membership fee of $1,500. This they do, and that is as far as they can get. The rest of the time is taken up by the home-loan banks in asking the building and loan associations silly questions which the building and loan associations try to answer in what must be a silly manner to the sleek-haired gent who occupies a desk in the Federal home-loan bank. In the meantime, another sleek-haired gentleman at another desk in the same building is all day long writing long letters urging building and loan associations to become members of the Federal home-loan bank and relieve the great distress of the home owners in their community. They are like Uncle Cater was by his saddle mare. They have the money but they don't want to part with it.

"A servant ruleth."

3. Billions of dollars have been provided by a benevolent President and Congress for Federal farm-loan banks. A number of clerks in these said banks write letters the whole day long to the various associations urging them to send in applications for loans. This is done. Three men, "good and true", appraise the property. The application is sent in, together with the appraisement and the recommendation of the loan association. Within a few weeks a dapper young fellow who does not know which end of a mule is hitched to a plow, is sent down from the Federal land bank to check the appraisement, etc. The farm does not look good to him. It would not. There are no sidewalks or paved roads running through the farm. The farm home is not steam heated and, horror of horrors, it does not even have a bathroom, or even hot and cold water! He promptly turns the loan down and hurries back home to the city and tells his fellows that one half of the world does not know how the other half lives. But, the clerks at the desk continue to send out letters urging the association to send in applications for loans. Truly one half of the clerks in Federal home-loan banks and the Federal farm-loan banks and the Federal Reserve banks have no idea what the other half therein is doing.

And yet, the depression goes sadly on.

But why should we "keer",
For we have beer?

6-HOUR DAY, 30-HOUR WEEK

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, some days ago I placed in the RECORD a letter from a man in Toledo, Ohio, with reference to certain statements he made as to several companies having attempted to have their employees write letters of protest against the 30-hour week bill. Later the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] inserted a telegram in the RECORD concerning that statement.

I have now two newspaper articles from Toledo quoting the president of one of these companies. These articles disclose the fact that Mr. Daniel H. Kelly is the executive vice president of the Electric Auto-Lite Co., and that he was responsible for a meeting of the manufacturers in Toledo to voice opposition to the measure. One of the newspaper articles contains this statement:

The letter—

Referring to the letter which I placed in the RECORD—ostensibly from an employee of one of the companies, complained that jobs of employees who refused to oppose the 30-hour-week plan had been threatened. It was pronounced by Daniel H. Kelly, executive vice president of the Electric Auto-Lite and a director of the other companies, as "a complete falsehood without any basis of fact."

Further the article says:

Mr. Kelly said employees of the company have been informed of the objections to the 30-hour week bill and had been furnished with some suggested forms for expressing opposition if they desired to register an opinion against the bill, but he denied that any pressure of any kind had been exerted. He said the information given was purely of an educational and informational nature. As proof of this, Mr. Kelly gave out a copy of the notice which was posted in the plants, signed by him as executive vice president.

Mr. President, I am going to ask that both of these articles be placed in the RECORD. It will be noted that the notice is signed by the vice president, who had called the meeting of protest, and was placed conspicuously for the employees to see it. It gives nine different reasons for their opposition to the measure and then calls upon them and suggests that if they object to the bill, he would suggest that they wire the President of the United States and their Congressmen. It seems that Mr. Kelly says he did not coerce, but simply gave information of an educational nature in order that they might act.

Mr. President, I ask that the two newspaper articles referred to may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The articles are as follows:

[From the Toledo (Ohio) Blade, Apr. 14, 1933]

INDUSTRIALISTS HERE OPPOSE 30-HOUR WEEK—PROTEST RESOLUTION SENT TO SENATORS, DUFFEY BY MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

The Merchants & Manufacturers' Association of Toledo, through its secretary, Friday sent to James A. Emery, general counsel of the national organization, and to Ohio Senators and Congressman WARREN J. DUFFEY the official protest of the organization against the proposed 30-hour week bill now pending in Congress.

The resolution adopted at a meeting of 75 Toledo manufacturers in the Toledo Club late Thursday, was offered by Daniel H. Kelly, executive vice president of the Electric Auto-Lite Co., and pledged members of the association to write to President Roosevelt, Senators Bulkley and Fess, and Members of the Ohio delegation in Congress to oppose the bill.

CALLED VICIOUS

Mr. Kelly said the legislation, known officially as the "Connery-Black bill", is the most vicious bill ever proposed. He said it represents an appropriation by the Government of functions which do not belong to the Government and would set up, he said, barriers between the States and would operate to the advantage of manufacturers who do only an intrastate business.

A motion to send three members to Washington to voice the protest was defeated. The association did, however, vote to provide forms of protest letters for employees who wish to protest the measure. It was deemed advisable that the employees' letters be not written on company stationery to avoid the appearance of coercion.

WAGE RATE FORECAST

Frank Collins, vice president of the National Supply Co.; Thomas Bentley, of the A. Bentley & Sons Co.; and others questioned the constitutionality of the Connery-Black bill, if enacted into law. The measure was described as the opening wedge in a plan to socialize industry.

Mr. Kelly said that although the measure does not provide wage rates, the next step, he forecasts, would be to add a wage-fixing provision.

[From the Toledo (Ohio) Blade, Apr. 19, 1933]

FACTORY HEADS DENY CHARGES—LETTER READ IN SENATE ON 30-HOUR WEEK ASSERTS THREATS WERE MADE

Denial of charges presented in a letter read by United States Senator BLACK in the Senate late Tuesday was made by officials of the Electric Auto-Lite Co., Logan Gear Co., and Bingham Stamping Co. Wednesday.

The letter, ostensibly from an employee of one of the companies, complained that jobs of employees who refused to oppose the 30-hour-week plan had been threatened. It was pronounced by Daniel H. Kelly, executive vice president of Electric Auto-Lite and a director of the other companies, as "a complete falsehood without any basis in fact."

Mr. Kelly said employees of the company have been informed of the objections to the 30-hour-week bill and had been furnished some suggested forms for expressing opposition if they desired to register an opinion against the bill, but he denied that pressure of any kind had been exerted. He said the information given was purely of an educational and informational nature. As proof of this Mr. Kelly gave out a copy of the notice which was posted in the plants, signed by him as executive vice president. The notice follows:

"Following is a statement regarding the objections to the 6-hour per day, 5- per week bill now pending in the House of Representatives:

"(1) The bill provides for the Federal Government to invade a field of regulation which belongs exclusively to the States.

"(2) It provides for additional governmental interference with business.

"(3) It would set up tariff walls between States and put interstate business at a disadvantage with intrastate business.

"(4) It will give foreign competitors extraordinary advantages over American producers.

"(5) It would require an extensive and expansive staff of Federal inspectors.

"(6) It would make illegal seasonal and emergency overtime work.

"(7) It would increase the demand for machinery to replace workmen.

"(8) It would necessitate complete readjustments in production methods, wage scales, and contracts.

"(9) The enforcement of the 30-hour-per-week provision would deepen the depression, retard recovery, decrease the total wage bill of the Nation, and dislocate the entire industrial structure of the country.

"The bill expressly eliminates executives, general superintendents and their immediate personal staffs. All other clerical employees would be immediately put on 6-hours-per-day, 30-hours-per-week basis. This would still further cut the time that you could work and your income.

"If you object to this change, would suggest that you wire the President of the United States and your Congressman."

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood that the Senate recessed last evening, or did it adjourn?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It took a recess.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was informed this morning that my friend, the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. PITTMAN], had undertaken to visé the Senate to find out how we stood on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, and, for fear that some Senators will send in word that they are in favor of the treaty without having heard something upon the other side of the question, I am compelled to take up a few moments to let the Senate understand how well Canada thinks she has performed at the expense of the American people.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the able Senator from Louisiana that I think there must be some error in the assumption that the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, an eminent Member of this body, would sound out Senators individually, with a view of ascertaining or directing their individual opinions. I think someone must have misinformed the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I do not think the Senator from Nevada is going to take exception to my statement.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am sorry to have to differ with the distinguished Senator from Illinois; I think I have never had to do so before; but I am attempting to ascertain now the sentiment of Senators on this side of the Chamber relative to action at an early date on the treaty referred to, and I intend to pursue that course.

Mr. LEWIS. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to intimate that the chairman of the committee had sought the opinions of individual Senators as to where they stood on that question.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I said "visé." I may not know what that word means, but as I interpret the word, I will inform the Senator from Illinois, I meant by it that the Senator from Nevada was attempting to find out how Senators on this side of the Chamber stood with regard to that treaty. I do not think that would be improper, and if I were interested in it I probably would do the same thing.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to say that if it is merely a question of taking up the treaty, I can understand that; but I thought the able Senator had intimated that the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee had sought to obtain the individual views of Senators on the treaty, which I knew he would not do.

Mr. LONG. I think we are all acquainted with our system here. Before bringing up some measure we find out how Senators stand on it. I do that, and I think the Senator from Nevada learned to do that long before I ever learned to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, with all courtesy, I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I think his misunderstanding was due to the word "visé" used by the Senator from Louisiana. I perfectly understood what he meant, having discussed the matter with him.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator from Nevada for his contribution.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], if he will not consent to have the resolution regarding the division of costs between the Federal Government and the State of New York referred to the Committee on Commerce? Since our last discussion of the matter here I have met the members of the power commission of my State. We discussed the matter at considerable length. When they left my office they expressed their willingness to have the resolution referred to the Commerce Committee provided it did not mean an endless discussion in that committee and delay of presentation of the matter. May I not ask the Senator if he would be willing to have the matter referred to the Commerce Committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the only object of referring a matter to a committee is that information may be gathered for the benefit of the Senate. The reference of this matter at this time to any other committee than the Foreign Relations Committee would certainly not expedite the obtaining of information for the benefit of the Senate.

As I said the other day, the question of whether or not the State of New York will be permitted to participate in the expenditure of the necessary money to build the St. Lawrence project and in consideration thereof shall have the use of the water allocated to the United States for the generation of power by the State of New York is involved in the whole question of whether we shall ratify the treaty or not. In the first place it involves the total cost to the United States Government in connection with the project. If the United States Government pays all the money allocated to the United States for the project, it will be probably $89,000,000 more than if the water to generate the power were allocated to the State of New York.

The whole question was studied and investigated and reported on by a commission. The report of the commission is quite voluminous. It was referred to a subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, together with the entire treaty, and exhaustive hearings were had upon it by that subcommittee. Hearings were had on all the questions brought out in the report of the commission. The question of the use of water allocated to the United States for the generation of power by the State of New York was involved in the whole consideration. The committee, it is true, as a committee has already favored the recommendation of the commission that the waters allocated to the United States, after a prior use of them under the treaty by the two Governments for navigation and without interference with the use of the waters for navigation, might be used by the State of New York for the generation of hydroelectric power in consideration of paying that proportion of the cost of the project that the commission stated should be allocated to the generation of power, which is $89,000,000.

The whole question was gone into by the Canadian Government on exactly the same report. The Canadian Government approved the report of the commission and allocated to the Province of Ontario, which borders on the part of the river where the power is generated, the use of the waters allocated to Canada for the generation of hydroelectric power. That was a very natural thing to do. The policy established by the Congress in several acts has been that the States which are deprived of natural resources, whether they be sovereign waters or whether they be timber or whether they be oil, are entitled to compensation for the withdrawal of those potential resources and taxable property by the Federal Government for its own use. That is the policy of the whole United States.

That policy is recognized by Canada in this matter with respect to Ontario. Canada has said in effect that if private individuals built the dams across the river, which would serve the same purpose for navigation, that then the dams and power houses would be subject to taxation on the one half by the Province of Ontario and on the other half by the State of New York, and if the waters are to be utilized for power, and Ontario on the one hand and the State of New York on the other hand are willing to pay, then that part of the entire cost of the project as determined by the commissioners of Canada and the United States should be allocated to that part of the construction, and, of course, it should go to that source.

We have recognized the same policy in connection with the Boulder Dam project. We recognized that the States of Arizona and Nevada, being the owners of the bed of the Colorado River and the banks of it, but being compelled by our Constitution to allow the Federal Government under the interstate commerce clause to utilize that State property for the building of a project, Congress has recognized that they should be compensated, so to speak, and so it has been provided that during the period of amortization all over and above the annual collections for power required to amortize annually the amount of the cost to the United States Government shall be divided between the States of Arizona and Nevada. It is true in that case that the States put up no money, and therefore they get only the surplus over the amortization fund; but in this case the State of New York and the Province of Ontario are required to put up that part of the construction cost which the commission for both governments have allocated as a proper cost to be charged as between navigation and the generation of power.

But all of these questions are interlocked with the entire problem involved in this project which has for its primary purpose navigation, but for its secondary purpose the generation of cheap hydroelectric power for the people of this country.

The Federal Government approves the commission's report. The Executive has approved it. So far as represented by the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee the committee has approved it. It is approved by the Canadian Government and the Province of Ontario.

It would seem to me, whether the Senators from New York are opposed to the St. Lawrence Treaty or not, that they would be exceedingly anxious to have the resolution passed as soon as possible because it only provides that if and when the St. Lawrence Treaty is ratified by the United States Senate and becames effective, then the water that may be used for power shall be used by the State of New York upon the payment of its just part of the construction cost. We have had voluminous hearings in the matter. Those hearings can be obtained by any Senator. They can be read and Senators can formulate their own opinions on this particular phrase or collateral issue arising out of the treaty.

It is evident that if the matter is referred to the Commerce Committee, or to any committee other than the Foreign Relations Committee, they must have hearings, they will have hearings, and in this session of Congress, when nearly every committee is intensely busy, when every Senator is intensely busy, when we are striving to deal with the most important problems that have ever faced this country, it would seem that there is no reasonable excuse to go over and over again something that has already been accomplished. It would add no information for the Senate that is new, and it would accomplish nothing on earth except delay; and I hesitate to think that the Senator from New York would desire delay on any question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator yield for the purpose of permitting me to ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

Mr. LONG. I yield in order that the Senator may address a question to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand, the Federal Government and the Power Authority of New York have agreed upon the controversial questions involved, as to the use of water and the disposition of water.

Mr. PITTMAN. That has all been agreed upon.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And is it not also a fact that a subcommittee conducted hearings for several weeks, gave everyone interested an opportunity to be heard, and that referring this matter now to the Commerce Committee, necessitating hearings, would only delay and prolong the consideration and final disposition of this treaty?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the only result that would be accomplished so far as I can see.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree to much that the Senator has said; but the matter which I have in my mind has not been studied by the committee. Ninety million dollars is a lot of money.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LONG. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Idaho if he wishes to ask something of the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator from Louisiana proposes to enter upon a debate as to the merits of this treaty?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, if the debate is to be opened, of course, the farm bill will have to be put aside.

Mr. LONG. No; I am not doing it in that way. I am debating the farm bill.

Mr. BORAH. I understand perfectly what the Senator is doing, but others will do the same thing.

Mr. LONG. We have not anything else to do right now, anyway.

Mr. BORAH. If that is true, I have no objection.

Mr. LONG. We are waiting on the inflation bill.

Mr. BORAH. I supposed there was an amendment to the farm bill pending now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. LONG. Before yielding further, if my friend from New York will permit me, I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho—he was not here when we began—that what brought up this discussion this morning was the fact that within his just and legal and other rights, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, was inquiring of Senators on this side of the Chamber how they stood on the St. Lawrence waterway treaty; and knowing, as I probably would have answered myself had I not known better and studied the matter a little bit more than ordinarily I would have studied it as a Senator, that a Senator might say he was all right on this proposal without looking into it particularly, I concluded that I had probably better give the Senate the Canadian view of this treaty.

The Senator from Idaho may not know it, and the Senator from Nevada may not know it, but I wanted the people of the country and the Members of the Senate to know just how Canada feels that it has caused America to invest $600,000,000 to take away American commerce from America and to give the commerce to Canada. That is why, pending Senators being asked privately as to how they might preliminarily look on this matter, I thought it was necessary to say something about this treaty this morning.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere with the Senator's program or any other Senator's program. I simply wish to know whether we are going ahead with the farm bill. If this treaty is to be opened to debate, of course that is within their pleasure, and other Senators will pursue the same course.

Mr. LONG. I do not intend to defer action on the farm bill, and I do not intend to speak more than just a few moments.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to say——

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Nevada did not answer my question, if the Senator will yield for just a moment.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say that I was unconscious that any move was afoot to bring this treaty before the Senate for discussion. I am very much interested in this treaty. The State of Illinois is very much interested in many phases of it. I am known to oppose these phases. I deplore the fact that a situation exists where there is an understanding from any source to bring this treaty on for consideration without full information in the Senate upon such a subject.

For myself I am glad to have the Senator from Louisiana say anything he desires; but I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that I am heartily in accord with him. I had no knowledge that this treaty was being brought on for consideration. I am opposed to its being brought on for consideration now, supplanting the farm bill; and I desire to have it known particularly that I desire a hearing, and a full and complete hearing, as to this treaty when it comes up, that I may express, in behalf of the State of Illinois, its opposition.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, Mr. President, I want to add, if the Senator will permit me, another word to the Senator from Nevada. What the Senator from Nevada is doing is delaying the final action upon this matter because, with all due deference to him, there are some of us here who are sufficiently interested in this question to wish to know what will be the economic effect upon the United States of building the St. Lawrence Canal. My State is interested because it is proposed to tax New York $90,000,000 of the cost of this canal. Any man who lives in that State must have enough interest in the taxpayers to want to know, "If we spend this $90,000,000, are we going to get our money back in the way of returns from the value of the power, or are we going to ruin our State by the diversion of commerce and trade to the St. Lawrence Canal?"

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. How much of that $90,000,000 is to be spent in Canada for Canadian labor and Canadian materials?

Mr. COPELAND. All of the money spent in the international section of the canal, which is the part involved here—all of it, all of the work which is done on Canadian soil—will be done by Canadian labor, but paid for by the United States, and $90,000,000 of it will be paid by my State.

Mr. CLARK. In other words, under this treaty we win the privilege of footing the bill, and that is the only privilege we get?

Mr. LONG. Exactly.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, my desire is that this matter may be referred to the Committee on Commerce to deal with a domestic question. I am not talking about the engineering features, or the other features which were considered by the Foreign Relations Committee, and well considered; but I wish to have the domestic side of it considered now, in order that we may determine in the State of New York whether we are throwing away $90,000,000, and harming our State tremendously. I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that if he thinks he is going to have rapid and immediate action on this matter through the process which he proposes, he is very much mistaken. I pledge for myself that if the matter goes to the Commerce Committee, these matters which have to do with the economic features will be the limit of what we will undertake—not the engineering problems or these other matters, but the purely domestic problems—and I think it is a perfectly fair proposal which I made to the Senate that this matter should go to the Commerce Committee for the consideration of those domestic problems.

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. LONG. I hope Senators will not ask me to yield further. I intend to speak for only a very few minutes; and if other Senators wish to say anything, they can do so in their own time. I will yield to the Senator from Nevada, however, if he wishes to answer what the Senator from New York has just said.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator says I did not answer his question. I thought my explanation was obvious. However, I will answer it almost categorically.

I certainly object, for the reasons I stated, to having the joint resolution referred to the Commerce Committee; and, to hasten the determination of the matter, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on which committee it will be referred to without further debate.

Mr. LONG. I do not want to have my remarks interrupted by any unanimous-consent proposal now, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks we vote without further debate.

Mr. LONG. I do not want to make any unanimous-consent agreement now. The Senator from New York might not be here. He has already announced that he has an important engagement this morning.

Mr. NORRIS. He has already spoken on the matter.

Mr. LONG. His remarks were interrupted by the morning hour having come to a close at 2 o'clock. That is my recollection. I am speaking about the other day.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say on this matter, but something ought to be said for the benefit of the American dollar and the American people on this St. Lawrence waterway treaty.

LENGTHENING ROUTE TO FOREIGN MARKETS

Mr. President, to begin with, I am afraid we have never been able to get the Senators who think they are interested in this treaty to look at just what they are doing. My friend from Nebraska no doubt believes that by favoring this treaty, he is voting to shorten the route to the sea for the farmers of Nebraska. He is not doing any such thing. He is actually lengthening the route over a thousand miles in order to be able to spend $600,000,000 of the American people's money for the benefit of Canada. We are not only lengthening the route to the sea by several hundred miles but we are diverting the traffic of America to Montreal and through Canada, and practically eliminating our own ports and our own traffic routes from all such things as participation in traffic.

Mr. President, I may not be able to convince the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Nevada that I am right about this matter. They may not take my word for it; but I will give them the word of the Empire with which they are dealing as to what we are about to do with America's $600,000,000.

This is a photostatic copy of an editorial appearing in the Toronto Mail and Empire of July 19, 1932.

WATERWAYS TREATY PROVIDES SHIP AND POWER CANALS AT SMALL COST TO CANADA

To be sure it is "at small cost to Canada." They have learned how to build up there. Canada has found out how to build. Canada has found out that whenever she wants to build anything in Canada, for Canada, with Canadian labor, for Canadian ports, the way to do it is to build it with the money of the United States. There may be some of us who have not found that out, but Canada has found it out; and every time I see the Canadian emissaries coming to the United States, I shiver in my boots as to what they are going to leave us when they return.

Now, let me read this editorial:

On its face the St. Lawrence waterways treaty signed at Washington yesterday by Hon. W. D. Herridge and Colonel Stimson is more favorable to Canada than any previous arrangement ever made with the United States.

Well, it will have to go some if that is true. "On its face", says this great Canadian journal, this treaty that has been signed between the United States and Canada "is more favorable to Canada" than any other treaty that they have ever made with the United States. With the well-known fact that we never lost a war and never won a conference with Canada, they are gracious enough to tell us that this treaty is more in their favor than any that they have ever had before.

I read further:

It is more favorable than anyone outside a limited government circle could have hoped for.

Why, to be sure "it is more favorable than anyone outside a limited government circle could have hoped for." Nobody else except the birds in that government that has been getting concessions of this kind from the United States since long before we had the War of 1812 would have had any idea that we would undertake to spend $600,000,000 of American money to build up ports in Canada, to increase the mileage distance to the sea, in order that they could take American commerce away from here.

I read a little further:

Congress must ratify the instrument before Parliament is asked to do so.

That is very noteworthy. Naturally they know they will have no trouble in getting the Canadian Parliament to ratify it.

The cost of the undertaking is to be borne mainly by the United States.

Why certainly. Why have that put in there? What is the use of informing the Canadian people that the cost of this Canadian project is to be borne mainly by the American people? It is a waste of space, it is a waste of breath, to try to inform the Canadian people that it is going to be borne mainly by the American people. Why certainly! They would not have been down here negotiating to build a canal in Canada, for Canadian commerce, with Canadian labor, for the benefit of Canada, if they had had any idea that the Canadian Government was going to have to pay for it. Why, certainly not! That is axiomatic. That goes without saying.

The Canadian two-stage plan in the international section is adopted in place of the United States single-stage plan. Canadian sovereignty over the works in Canadian waters is absolutely established.

Certainly; we knew that.

To this end there is a complete segregation of the properties on the two sides of the border. Without altering in the slightest degree Canada's age-long policy of joint development of the St. Lawrence waterway, we obtain a 27-foot navigation channel from the Atlantic to the head of Lake Superior. What is still more important, we have retained the right to construct an all-Canadian waterway, at any time in the future, if the expenditure involved in such undertaking is deemed advisable.

Certainly. In other words, because they not only control but—and I will read it again—they have "retained the right to construct an all-Canadian waterway at any time in the future if the expenditure involved in such undertaking is deemed advisable." In other words, we may sacrifice our rights to Canada, but Canada retains her rights in this matter.

The judgment of the United States Supreme Court, requiring Chicago to reduce the extraction of water from Lake Michigan to a mere fraction of what it has been and is today, is embodied in the treaty.

I am going to pause in the reading here long enough to try to inform some of the Senators from the Mississippi Valley and the Southern States and coast States what this means.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not a fact that while, under the terms of the treaty, the United States absolutely internationalizes a lake which lies wholly within the boundaries of the United States, thereby giving up for all time jurisdiction over the amount of water that can be diverted from Lake Michigan to the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project, it still permits Canada to take all the water she wants out of Georgian Bay to construct an all-Canadian waterway from Georgian Bay to the Ottawa River, lying wholly within Canada, and to take as much water as she pleases out of the Great Lakes system?

Mr. LONG. That is my understanding. The United States has spent hundreds of millions of dollars, as we understood, to promote our domestic waterway system for our foreign and domestic commerce. Now the proposal is to limit the amount of water supply that we can have through the Great Lakes system for this construction of the all-year-round waterway system from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, which is interwoven with our flood-control plan. A dollar spent for one is a dollar spent for both. But the proponents of this project intend to come along and to divert $600,000,000 of our money, not for the purpose of promoting this American system of commerce but in order that $600,000,000 may make it possible for Canada to take advantage of a proposition on which the United States is spending all this money.

PROTECT AMERICAN PORTS

Let us consider the ports of the State of Texas. They are as much interested in this matter as anyone else. Consider the ports of the State of Texas, like Galveston and Houston and Port Arthur; the ports of Louisiana, like Lake Charles, Baton Rouge, and New Orleans; the ports of Mississippi, like Gulfport; the ports of Alabama, like Mobile; the ports of Georgia, like Savannah; of South Carolina, like Charleston, and on up the coast line. Are the States like Missouri, Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, all of these States, to see trade advantages taken away from these ports and away from these waterways, and funds which are needed for the completion of the flood-control projects diverted up to Canada in order that Canada may have the only port which American commerce can patronize, because we have spent all of our money for the purpose of extolling the port of Montreal and other Canadian ports, and have denied the money that is needed for the proper development of our own waterways?

I had a map here showing the situation, but the Senator from New York had to take it with him. It illustrates the matter. We do not need, in order to have a shorter route to the sea from these Western States, to go through Canada, unless we are determined that when we leave the sea we are going around close to Newfoundland in order to get to those States. A waterway can be cut for an approximate distance of around 300 miles; I do not know the exact distance, and I have not the figures which are shown on a map, which the Senator from New York had to take with him a moment ago, but if we want to transport traffic from the sea to the west, as I understand it, we can go down through the Hudson River a distance of only 338 miles, all-American, on American soil, with American labor, and go into the American port of New York City, a distance of only three hundred and some-odd miles, at a cost which will be infinitely less than it is going to cost to build the St. Lawrence waterway, and bring the traffic to the sea by a route which is some thousand or so miles shorter than to go through Canada, at an expense of $600,000,000 of American money.

Mr. President, let me read further from this Canadian editorial.

> Other advantages summarized.
> Not only this! The United States abandoned its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an "American lake."

Certainly! We might have known that if we got into anything with them, we were going to give up something—$600,000,000 is not enough. Building up a port of Canada is not enough. Lengthening the route in order that we can give our trade to Canada is not enough. We have to give away Lake Michigan.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I remind the able Senator from Louisiana that the Secretary of State, then Secretary Root, in dealing with Canada touching the question of a treaty concerning the lake, announced to Canada that that lake was an integral lake, a domestic body of water belonging to the United States, was in no wise an international body of water, nor were its banks international, and that, therefore, it was removed from the discussion as an international water; and Canada did not then, nor has she since in writing anywhere, taken issue with that fact, because it was established in history.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator. I had understood that there was no contention whatever, and I thank the Senator for the source from which this information comes, that there was no contention whatever that Lake Michigan was an international body of water, including even the banks. It has been accepted, and no claim has been made to the contrary, that Lake Michigan was an integral part of the United States of America. But lo and behold! we come here now with a treaty by which we are internationalizing Lake Michigan in order to give Canada water which is seriously and badly needed to take care of the domestic commerce and the domestic plan of navigation and flood control of the United States. I say domestic within the sense that it is within the borders of the United States.

Let me read a little further, because we get a better explanation from the Canadian papers than we have ever been able to get from the American press. They understand the matter better. If we want to find out what the treaty provides, we should not ask our American statesmen and our American friends to explain it. The gentlemen in Canada will understand it so much better, and can state its benefits so much more succinctly, if they state what it is, so far as concerns Canada, that it is a waste of time to fool around among our domestic statesmen and newspapers in trying to find out what a treaty contains. Therefore I read from the Canadian editorial again:

> That great body of water has become forever—

Listen to this. This ought to make the American hearts swell with pride:

> That great body of water has become forever through this new treaty an international body of water, which belongs to the St. Lawrence watershed instead of to the Mississippi watershed.

I wonder what the statesmen of the Mississippi Valley, 32 States which use the Mississippi River watershed—I wonder what the men who are sitting in the United States Senate from the shores of the Ohio River, and the Missouri River, and the Mississippi River, and from the States which are affected by the rivers which flow into the Mississippi River—I wonder what they think of this proposal that we now are to take Lake Michigan away from the Mississippi watershed to prevent the canalizing of the all-year-round waterway system and turn it over to the St. Lawrence waterway project in order that we can give Canada ports which the United States cannot have.

I read again:

> While enlarged canals will not bring great ocean liners to Toronto and other inland Canadian cities, it will greatly stimulate water-borne traffic to and from these cities by lake vessels and ocean tramps.

Sure; we will not bring the great trans-Atlantic liners in there, but we will take the little old tramp steamers and the other little old vessels over water taken away from us and keep the United States from having anything but a jig-jog traffic moving into American ports in order to load up trans-Atlantic liners with freight at Canadian ports.

I read further:

> Even Port Arthur and Fort William, more than 2,300 miles from the Straits of Belle Isle, will be in close touch by water with the shippers of Great Britain and the world. The deeper waterway means much, not only in Ontario and Quebec, and the Prairie Provinces, for it also confers upon the eastern Maritime Provinces, and even upon British Columbia, opportunities for increased trade with the interior of Canada.

Certainly. I hope Senators understood that. Here is a very salient statement made. It is stated here that this gives to the mother country, the British Empire, greater opportunities to promote its trade with Canada. The United States is not only spending $600,000,000 to take Canadian and British trade from the United States, but we are actually spending this money so that hereafter the trade that is coming to the United States from Canada will be certain to go from Canada to Great Britain, at the expense of the United States.

What business we are getting out of Canada now we are giving up to Great Britain, spending $600,000,000 of the money of the American people in order that the business the American people are now getting from Canada will go through the St. Lawrence project to Great Britain. That is what they say here in black and white. They know what they are doing. We may not know it, but they do. I read further:

On the eve of the imperial conference the treaty announces the creation of a larger field and new facilities for Empire trade.

Certainly; Empire trade, trade within the Empire. This project, which is to be constructed with the money of the people of the United States, makes it possible for the Canadians to announce that they have developed trade waterways, and facilities within the Empire so that the trade and interchange between the various provinces and countries of Great Britain will be expedited, to our loss.

I now read again from this sheet:

Cost to Canadian Treasury only $38,000,000.

We are putting up $600,000,000 to start with, and that will not half pay the cost before we get through with it, but the cost to the Canadian Treasury is to be only $38,000,000.

Listen to this, gentlemen of the Senate. I want those who are legislating for the people of the United States to listen to this next line:

No feature of the treaty is more surprising or more satisfactory than the low cost to Canada at which the undertaking is to be carried out.

Nothing, they say, is more surprising to Canada than the low cost of the project to Canada. Certainly it is surprising. I read further:

Because of want of information, the press has carried all sorts of extravagant statements as to the heavy financial burden with which the taxpayers were to be saddled in a time of depression. As late as last Saturday a Montreal newspaper estimated that the Canadian people would be mulcted to the tune of $570,000,000. All such erratic predictions have been relegated to the realm of the absurd and sublimely ridiculous. The treaty provides that the cost of the deep waterways to the Dominion Treasury will be $38,071,000. This total is reached by adding the $22,320,000 to be spent in the International Rapids section for property damages, rehabilitation work, and the Chrysler Island Canal to the $82,954,000 to be spent for locks and canals on the Canadian section, and by subtracting from the total $67,202,500 to be paid by Ontario to the Dominion on account of power works in the international section. This total cost of $38,071,000 may be cut to $33,638,500 if a proposed guard lock at Beauharnois is found unnecessary, which is altogether probable. These figures are based upon the 1926 estimates made by the international board of engineers on the project and since revised by that board. It is not to be forgotten that general construction costs are now down about 30 percent. The reasonableness of this remark is based on the fact that the Livingston Channel, in the Detroit River, was estimated to cost $7,000,000 and is now actually being built under contract for $3,400,000. If the cost of construction were to remain as low as it is today during the years of construction the outlay by the Dominion Treasury might not amount to more than $25,000,000. The cost to the United States is placed at $243,661,000, made up of $178,651,000 to be spent on the International Rapids section and $65,100,000 for channel deepening and other necessary works in the upper lakes. Canada is given credit for $128,000,000 spent on the New Welland Canal and for other construction work.

CANADIAN LABOR AND MATERIALS

Most of the construction work will be done in Canada. All the construction work on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that. Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side in the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used.

I hope the Senate got that. This is a Canadian newspaper which says:

Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side in the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used. All the labor and materials employed in the Canadian power development at Chrysler Island and Barnhart Island power plants is to be paid for by the Ontario Government and will, of course, be Canadian—

Why, certainly—

As indicated by the maps published in connection with the treaty, the international section, which reaches from a little below Prescott to a little below Cornwall, is 115 miles in length. Most of the development occurs in Canadian waters.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to skip just a bit of what is printed along that line and come to a reference to a very important part of this treaty.

MAY BUILD ALL-CANADIAN CANAL

Those who have been nervous about Canadian sovereignty should read article 5 of the treaty, which provides that each of the high contracting parties shall retain complete ownership of, and complete legislative and administrative jurisdiction over, all works lying on its own side of the international boundary, irrespective of the agency by which such works are constructed.

TIMELY GESTURE TO THE EMPIRE

Later on we read:

Chicago checked; Lake Michigan internationalized.

We ought to be proud of this. It seems like any time we can take a slap at Chicago, then everybody seems proud about it, but I see no reason for that, because Chicago's waterways are most necessary to all of us. What do they say about checking Chicago?

As already noted, the treaty itself puts an end to Chicago's ambition to drain the Great Lakes for the benefit of a deep waterway to the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Mississippi Valley.

It puts an end to the dream of Chicago. It puts an end to the dream of St. Louis and Cairo and Memphis and of Arkansas and of Mississippi. It puts an end, it says here, to all those things. I hope my able friend from Illinois heard me read it.

As already noted, the treaty itself puts an end to Chicago's ambition to drain the Great Lakes for the benefit of a deep waterway to the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Mississippi Valley.

Why, certainly; it is going to dry the Mississippi Valley to the point where it will be nothing but a floodgate. It will put an end to navigation in the Mississippi Valley, according to this Canadian view of the matter. It will put an end to it because when you internationalize Lake Michigan and keep us from having the waters of that lake that are necessary to canalize that river in order to have all-the-year-round navigation you have bottled up the one great commercial waterway system of America that everyone thought should be kept open.

Away back yonder the President of the United States—I have forgotten which President it was—sent Robert Fulton down to New Orleans. Before he had invented the steamboat he was sent by Mr. Dearborn, the Secretary of War, down to New Orleans, La., to look into the proposition of cutting a canal between Lake Pontchartrain, leading into the Mississippi River, in order that the Mississippi River might be made a commercial waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, and in order that it might be a great source of national defense in war time. Robert Fulton went down to Louisiana and reported back to the United States Government that there ought to be constructed a canal connecting Lake Pontchartrain with the Mississippi River.

BUILT AND PAID FOR BY LOUISIANA

The United States Government never did build that canal from Lake Pontchartrain to the Mississippi; but when the war came on with Germany, in 1918 the State of Louisiana was appealed to by the national authorities, and that State laid out a total sum of $26,250,000 to build the canal between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River for the benefit of the people of the United States. We thought we were going to get our 26¼ million dollars back; we were entitled to our $26,000,000 back; but, instead of paying us back the $26,000,000 for building that canal between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River, which everybody from Fulton's day down to now said ought to be built, you have taken our money, added about $75,000,000 to it, and propose to give it to Canada to destroy this great project in the Mississippi Valley for the benefit of the port of Montreal.

I will read a little bit further from this article. I sometimes think, Mr. President, that we ought just to have an executive council, so that we might get along a little bit better. I tell you if this thing keeps going on the thing for us to do will be to move to Canada. If I had money enough to move to Canada, I believe I would go there; I want to get nearer my boss. Now I read a little bit further from this Canadian newspaper:

It provides that the abstraction of water through the Chicago Drainage Canal, shall be reduced by December 31, 1938, to an amount not exceeding an annual average of 1,500 cubic feet per second in addition to the domestic pumpage by the city of Chicago.

This arrangement, which permits a 9-foot channel to the Mississippi, cannot be varied except by international agreement. It is the first time in history that the United States has agreed to place the abstraction of water from Lake Michigan under international control. This really means that Lake Michigan is admitted by the neighboring Republic to be an international waterway, like the other Great Lakes. Henceforth it belongs definitely by international agreement to the St. Lawrence watershed and cannot be exploited for the increased benefit of the Mississippi watershed.

Do you think, Mr. President, that we who are living on the Mississippi River, who have stood the scourges of floods on that river year in and year out, who have seen our homes washed away, our agricultural land destroyed in the space of a nighttime, who have seen men, women, and children picked up in boats from the waters that come from all over the United States and have flooded on that land—do you expect now that we are going to let you make us nothing but a dumping ground for the flood waters of this Nation, and that we are not going to be allowed to share in the international benefits of navigation when America has waters within its own confines? Is that going to be the policy of the United States? Are you going to turn your back on a flood-control project to which this Nation is committed and which involves an expenditure of $1,000,000,000 or more, and take $600,000,000 of that money and divert it to Montreal in order to give this country a port?

And what are you doing to New York? Why destroy the port of New York? Why destroy Chicago? Why destroy New Orleans? And you are doing the same thing to the ports of the Pacific coast. There is nobody sitting in the Senate from the Pacific coast who has studied this question sufficiently who does not know that if you are going to throw this whole thing over in the mountain part of this country to where it has got to go by Canada by the shortest route that can be provided to Great Britain, it is going to mean the condemnation of Pacific coast ports; it is going to mean the same thing to those ports that it is going to mean to Atlantic ports.

DEVELOP AMERICAN WATERWAYS

Mr. President, every man with any kind of pride is interested in the waterway improvement work that has been done from Florida up to the Great Lakes. I see my friend the Senator from Florida in his seat. We have been trying to get a canal cut across the peninsula of Florida in the United States. Such a canal would accommodate more commerce than the Panama Canal accommodates. We have been trying day after day and night after night to get this country developed not only through the means of Mississippi waterways and Ohio waterways and Missouri waterways, but we have also been trying to get a canal cut across the peninsula of Florida. Somebody said it would cost two or three hundred million dollars to do it; various estimates have been made of the cost; but, regardless of what estimates have been made of the cost, it could have been done for less than one third the amount of money that we are going to spend under this international treaty in order to benefit the port of Montreal. We have not built that canal—that is too expensive a proposition; we cannot complete the Mississippi River improvement—that is going to cost too much; we cannot complete the Missouri River improvement—that is going to cost too much; we cannot complete the work on our ports and the work on our harbors because it is going to cost too much; but here we are in a treaty, in order to have the privilege of giving away Lake Michigan to Canada, in order to have the privilege of giving away the commerce of the Lakes, we are to spend more money than it will cost for all the projects that have been mentioned and which are being held up today because it is said America has not enough money to pay for them. What statesmanship! I graduated out of the class I formerly belonged to so long ago, Mr. President, until I do not feel at home.

As I said a few days ago in the Senate, something ought to be done to make us feel some consciousness of the welfare of our own people. I believe it is going finally to come down to a time when someone will propose a constitutional amendment to provide that members of the Cabinet and legislators who make and ratify treaties shall spend a few days in some other occupation and learn a little more about them, because when we become embroiled and entangled with these questions and with transactions and dealings of this kind with foreign nations we never come out of them except by giving up the rights and commerce of America and paying for foreign investments and foreign improvements in order that we may take away commerce from the United States.

Mr. President, I think I have talked enough on this matter. I am not going to read the remainder of this article, but I am going to send it to the desk and ask that it may be printed at the conclusion of my remarks; and, if possible, I ask that it be printed in regular-sized type, if there is no objection, because I should like to have the article read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule it cannot be printed in the regular-sized RECORD type without authority of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. LONG. Then I will just ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the article will be printed at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks.

(The article appears at the end of Mr. LONG's remarks marked "Exhibit A.")

Mr. LONG. I will say this word in closing. I ask Members on this side of the Chamber and on the Republican side of the Chamber, until they have had an opportunity to go into the points of this treaty not, preliminarily or otherwise, to commit themselves as being in favor of this monstrosity. I ask, regardless of any poll that may be made in the Senate, that no Senator preliminarily, conditionally, or otherwise, commit himself in the remotest degree or extent to the support of what is contained in this international treaty between Canada and the United States; and when this matter shall be properly before the Senate we will then be in a position to go into it from Dan to Beersheba and register our objections to the United States' spending the money of its people for the benefit of Canada and thereby creating further unemployment among its own citizens.

EXHIBIT A

[Editorial from the Toronto Mail and Empire, Toronto, Canada. One of the outstanding newspapers of the Dominion. It expresses the joy and appreciation of Canada at the great victory won by Canadian statesmen in the St. Lawrence treaty between the United States and Canada, signed at Washington, July 18, 1932.]

WATERWAYS TREATY PROVIDES SHIP AND POWER CANALS AT SMALL COST TO CANADA

On its face the St. Lawrence Waterways Treaty signed at Washington yesterday by Hon. W. D. Herridge and Colonel Stimson is more favorable to Canada than any previous arrangement ever made with the United States. It is more favorable than anyone outside a limited Government circle could have hoped for. Though executed at the American Capital, it concedes to this country practically all the conditions long insisted upon by the most jealous guardians of Canadian rights. Congress must ratify the instrument before Parliament is asked to do so. The cost of the undertaking is to be borne mainly by the United States. The Canadian 2-stage plan in the international section is adopted in place of the United States single-stage plan. Canadian sovereignty over the works in Canadian waters is absolutely established. To this end there is a complete segregation of the properties on the two sides of the border. Without altering in the slightest degree Canada's age-long policy of joint development of the St. Lawrence waterway, we obtain a 27-foot navigation channel from the Atlantic to the head of Lake Superior. What is still more important, we have retained the right to construct an all-Canadian waterway, at any time in the future, if the expenditure involved in such undertaking is deemed advisable. The judgment of the United States Supreme Court, requiring Chicago to reduce the extraction of water from Lake Michigan to a mere fraction of what it has been and is today, is embodied in the treaty.

OTHER ADVANTAGES SUMMARIZED

Not only this, the United States abandons its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an "American lake." That great body of water has become forever, through this new treaty, an international body of water which belongs to the St. Lawrence watershed instead of to the Mississippi watershed. While enlarged canals will not bring great ocean liners to Toronto and other inland Canadian cities, it will greatly stimulate water-borne traffic to and from these cities by lake vessels and ocean tramps. Even Port Arthur and Fort William, more than 2,300 miles from the Straits of Belle Isle, will be in close touch by water with the shippers of Great Britain and the world. The deeper waterway means much not only to Ontario and Quebec and the prairie Provinces, for it also confers upon the eastern Maritime Provinces and even upon British Columbia opportunities for increased trade with the interior of Canada. On the eve of the imperial conference the treaty announces the creation of a larger field and new facilities for empire trade.

COST TO CANADIAN TREASURY ONLY $38,000,000

No feature of the treaty is more surprising or more satisfactory than the low cost to Canada at which the undertaking is to be carried out. Because of want of information, the press has carried all sorts of extravagant statements as to the heavy financial burden with which the taxpayers were to be saddled in a time of depression. As late as last Saturday a Montreal newspaper estimated that the Canadian people would be mulcted to the tune of $570,000,000. All such erratic predictions have been relegated to the realm of the absurb and sublimely ridiculous. The treaty provides that the cost of the deep waterways to the Dominion Treasury will be $38,071,000. This total is reached by adding the $22,320,000 to be spent in the International Rapids section for property damages, rehabilitation work, and the Chrysler Island canal to the $82,954,000 to be spent for locks and canals on the Canadian section, and by subtracting from the total $67,202,500 to be paid by Ontario to the Dominion on account of power works in the international section. This total cost of $38,071,000 may be cut to $33,638,500 if a proposed guard lock at Beauharnois is found unnecessary, which is altogether probable. These figures are based upon the 1926 estimates made by the international board of engineers on the project and since revised by that board. It is not to be forgotten that general construction costs are now down about 30 percent. The reasonableness of this remark is based on the fact that the Livingston Channel, in the Detroit River, was estimated to cost $7,000,000 and is now actually being built under contract for $3,400,000. If the cost of construction were to remain as low as it is today during the years of construction, the outlay by the Dominion Treasury might not amount to more than $25,000,000. The cost to the United States is placed at $243,661,000, made up of $178,651,000 to be spent on the International Rapids section and $65,100,000 for channel deepening and other necessary works in the upper Lakes. Canada is given credit for $128,000,000 spent on the new Welland Canal and for other construction work.

CANADIAN LABOR AND MATERIALS

Most of the construction work will be done in Canada. All the construction work on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that. Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side in the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used. All the labor and materials employed in the Canadian power development at Chrysler Island and Barnhart Island power plants is to be paid for by the Ontario Government and will, of course, be Canadian. As indicated by the maps published in connection with the treaty, the international section, which reaches from a little below Prescott to a little below Cornwall, is 115 miles in length. Most of the development occurs in Canadian waters.

MAY BUILD ALL-CANADIAN CANAL

Those who have been nervous about Canadian sovereignty should read article 5 of the treaty, which provides that each of the high contracting parties shall retain complete ownership of, and complete legislative and administrative jurisdiction over, all works lying on its own side of the international boundary, irrespective of the agency by which such works are constructed. Such works shall constitute a part of the territory and property of the country in which they are situated. This proviso is deliberately inserted to protect Canadian sovereignty over all structures lying on the Canadian side, even though these structures have been built with United States money. In addition to this, Canada retains the specific right to construct at any time in the future, wholly within its own territory, alternative channel and canal facilities along the Great Lakes or in the St. Lawrence River, including the international section of the St. Lawrence. It has a right to use for such purely Canadian canal purposes whatever water there may be necessary for the operation thereof. As we indicated before, this clause places Canada in a position to build an all-Canadian waterway, if at any time in the future it is deemed wise to enter upon the expenditure involved in such an undertaking. This is one of the most important and one of the most satisfactory points in a treaty which fairly bristles with satisfactory points.

TIMELY GESTURE TO THE EMPIRE

The Ottawa Government regards this treaty as of great importance to Great Britain and the Empire. It was, therefore, anxious to have it signed before the opening of the imperial conference, and it is to be congratulated upon having obtained its wish in this respect. It is stipulated in one of the articles of the treaty that all British shipping in all parts of the Empire shall have the right to navigation in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence waterway for all time. This means that all British ships as well as all Canadian ships shall have access through the deepened water channels to the head of Lake Superior. In this sense, the Great Lakes are merged with the oceans. The Great Lakes become the Mediterranean Sea of North America. It is not expected that great liners will ascend the canals, but there will be an ever-increasing flow of freighters and ocean-going vessels carrying cargoes inland and returning with outgoing cargoes.

The deepened route will be of a special advantage to the shipping and trading industry of the United Kingdom, because, according to the gnomonic map projection, Montreal and Windsor, Ontario, lie in a straight line on the shortest route from Liverpool. The deep waterway will thus provide a remarkably direct route for the shipment of grain, flour, coal, and other commodities between interior Canada and Great Britain. We thus have Windsor, Hamilton, Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, and Quebec (with Fort William and Port Arthur only a little out of line) on an invaluable imperial trade artery connecting them with the mother country.

CHICAGO CHECKED, LAKE MICHIGAN INTERNATIONALIZED

As already noted, the treaty itself puts an end to Chicago's ambition to drain the Great Lakes for the benefit of a deep waterway to the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Mississippi Valley. It provides that the abstraction of water through the Chicago Drainage Canal shall be reduced by December 31, 1938, to an amount not exceeding an annual average of 1,500 cubic feet per second, in addition to the domestic pumpage by the city of Chicago. This embodies the decree of the United States Supreme Court in international law. Chicago must cut its present flow from 8,180 cubic feet per second to the maximum prescribed in the treaty. This arrangement, which permits a 9-foot channel to the Mississippi, cannot be varied except by international agreement. It is the first time in history that the United States has agreed to place the abstraction of water from Lake Michigan under international control. This really means that Lake Michigan is admitted by the neighboring Republic to be an international waterway like the other Great Lakes. Henceforth it belongs definitely by international agreement to the St. Lawrence watershed and cannot be exploited for the increased benefit of the Mississippi watershed. It is further provided that there shall hereafter be no abstraction from the Great Lakes system to another watershed except by authorization of the international joint commission representing both nations. This constitutes a perpetual safeguard to the waters of the Great Lakes system from Port Arthur, Fort William, and Duluth to the Gulf of the St. Lawrence.

OGOKI WATERSHED AS COMPENSATION

Canada gains another victory over the so-called "Ogoki diversion." It has been known for a long time that Ogoki Lake, lying north of Lake Superior, and all the waters flowing into it, which now find their outlet in Hudson Bay, can be readily diverted into Lake Nipigon, and thus into the St. Lawrence River system. Canada thus gains the right to divert 4,000 cubic feet per second of water into Lake Nipigon for use in power developments on the Nipigon, St. Mary, and St. Lawrence Rivers. It is estimated that this additional flow of water will furnish 520,400 horsepower, and this is all to belong to Canada. There is another important point in the fact that this access of water from the Ogoki watershed will compensate for the limited loss for the drainage canal which is to be allowed Chicago. In this connection it is to be added that the United States is to spend millions of dollars on the construction of compensation works in the Niagara and St. Clair Rivers. These works will, the engineers say, furnish adequate protection for navigation all down the Great Lakes system to Montreal.

CANADA GETS 4,000,000 HORSEPOWER; UNITED STATES 1,000,000

The treaty has its power side as well as its navigation side. The work in the international section and in the national section will develop about 5,000,000 horsepower. Of this, 2,000,000 horsepower will be available in the international section and 3,000,000 in the national section. Canada—that is to say, the Province of Ontario—is to obtain 1,000,000 of the 2,000,000 horsepower to be produced in the international section, but all of the 3,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the national section, which is wholly in Quebec, will belong to this country. This means that Canada is to obtain 4,000,000 horsepower and the United States 1,000,000 horsepower out of the whole St. Lawrence waterway development. We thus come in on a basis of 4 to 1, which ought to be satisfactory to most hydroelectric enthusiasts and to most private power enthusiasts in Quebec. It is, of course, up to Quebec to use the power available in its own provincial area in the manner that it sees fit by agreement with the federal authorities. Our point at the present is that by the negotiation of this highly favorable treaty with the United States, Ontario and Quebec are protected for long years to come against a shortage of power. This power means much to the industrial future of the nation, because it can be used to operate plants lying along 2,300 miles of deep-water navigation in full communication with every part of the world. This combination of cheap power and transportation facilities will be one of the most remarkable in the world.

GREAT ST. LAWRENCE INDUSTRIAL REGION

It is probably not going too far to predict that with this new canal and power development on the St. Lawrence River, with little cost to Canada, the Great Lakes region and St. Lawrence Valley will, in the next few years, be lifted into a place of industrial leadership. The present depression is only a passing phase. The deep-waterways treaty, like the imperial conference, is a long step on the road toward the recovery of prosperity. As already indicated, with the deep-water channel to Great Britain and to other parts of the world, and with an abundance of cheap power for manufacturing purposes, a multiplication of industries along the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River is certain to occur within the next few years. We shall probably not be viewing the situation too optimistically if we say that the new St. Lawrence River development will give this part of North America a foremost place in industrial development. We believe, indeed, that the most highly industrialized section of the New World will bestride the international boundary.

IN HARMONY WITH PAST DEVELOPMENTS

We have already shown that there is to be no abandonment of Canadian sovereignty in the St. Lawrence. The treaty involves no departure from the historical Canadian policy regarding the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes. For many years the Canadian and United States Goverments have cooperated in improvements to navigation in order to provide larger and larger vessels with adequate accommodation and especially adequate depths of water. The United States has used our canals and Canada has used the American canals. Much of the excavation work in the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers has been done by the United States in Canadian waters, with, of course, Canada's consent. On the other hand, channels deepened by Canada have been free to the United States. A good deal of this sort of work and of compensation work remains to be done between Lake Erie and Lake Huron, in the Niagara River, in the upper St. Lawrence River, and in the lower St. Lawrence. Our contention is that in working with the United States under the restrictions embodied in the treaty there is no departure from our long-established national policy.

REMOVING OBSTACLES TO NAVIGATION

The primary object of the treaty is to provide a 27-foot waterway from the ocean to the head of the Great Lakes. This depth of water is already available for all but a small fraction of the distance. That fraction lies between Lake Ontario and Montreal. This part of the route, with its 14-foot canals, has for long constituted a definite obstacle to navigation. It has held up the development of the rest of the route. It renders the new Welland Canal, upon which we have spent $128,000,000, or nearly four times as much as the new development is to cost the Dominion Treasury, comparatively useless. This is a matter in which all of Ontario, all of Quebec, and indeed the whole of Canada, are intensely interested. The time has come to remove the hiatus in order that the greatest lake and river navigation route in the world may come into its own. The missing link is to be fitted into the chain. It would be foolish to leave the job undone.

TRIUMPH FOR BENNETT AND HERRIDGE

The waterways treaty between His Majesty the King and the President of the United States was signed by the Hon. W. D. Herridge, Canadian Minister at Washington, and by Hon. H. L. Stimson, United States Secretary of State. The Prime Minister has said that it fulfills the conservative pledge regarding the St. Lawrence made at the Winnipeg convention of 1927 and the Prime Minister's own pledge in the same connection, which he gave in Winnipeg during the general election of 1930. We are not surprised at his frank assertion that no big interests are to be allowed to block the enterprise.

The negotiation and the conclusion of the treaty illustrate the present Government's belief in the future of Canada. They also illustrate the driving power of the Prime Minister and his capacity for getting big things done. On the eve of the greatest Empire conference the world has ever seen, he has been able to announce this new Canadian and imperial arrangement with the United States. To Mr. Herridge goes the main credit for the negotiation of the treaty. Ever since last October he has labored night and day to bring it about. He has made countless trips between Ottawa and Washington on this special mission, and with the backing of the Premier he has been able to secure an instrument which concedes to Canada practically all of Canada's demands. He has obtained a treaty which places the bulk of the cost on the United States and involves the Dominion Treasury in an expenditure of less than $40,000,000. This and his success in obtaining a greatly increased number of air channels from the United States for radio purposes, amply justify his appointment to the Washington post. He would not have accepted that position but for the prospect of doing these two jobs for Canada, and his double achievement marks him as an international diplomat of first-class order. We do not think that any Canadian will take exception to this statement. In the language of the street, he has carried the message to Garcia, delivered the goods, and brought home the bacon.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon withhold the suggestion for a moment?

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a sentence?

Mr. REED. Gladly.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, at the proper time, when the St. Lawrence Treaty comes before the Senate, I shall be very happy to undertake to demonstrate that the remarkable address to which we have just listened is as replete with errors of fact as it is with errors of consistency.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator from Michigan is in error all the way through on the question of waterways, or else we are.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I simply want to illustrate with one example the thought that I undertook to condense into one sentence. My able friend from Louisiana has repeatedly referred to the $600,000,000 project involved. The net cost to the American Treasury is $125,000,000, according to official estimates of those upon whom we are entitled to depend. I do not care to debate the matter at the present time, because it would be inappropriate to debate it now. Anyone can get ex parte statements upon any side of the proposition as he may wish. I simply suggest that it is unfair to prejudge the matter on the basis of ex parte statements. I made that statement as a fair example of the fact that there are two sides to the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that all these estimates of cost are practically valueless, because we cannot make an estimate of cost unless we know whether we are talking about the gold dollar of yesterday or the rubber dollar of tomorrow.

Mr. LONG. At the proper time, as the Senator from Michigan expresses it, we will show that the cost to the United States will be probably much nearer $1,000,000,000 than $600,000,000.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Keyes	Reynolds
Ashurst	Couzens	King	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	Lewis	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	Logan	Schall
Bankhead	Dill	Lonergan	Sheppard
Barbour	Duffy	Long	Shipstead
Barkley	Erickson	McAdoo	Smith
Black	Fletcher	McCarran	Steiwer
Bone	Frazier	McGill	Stephens
Borah	George	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	Glass	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	Murphy	Trammell
Byrd	Hale	Neely	Tydings
Byrnes	Harrison	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Norris	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hatfield	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hayden	Overton	Walcott
Clark	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Connally	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Kean	Pope	White
Copeland	Kendrick	Reed

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting several nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a short statement regarding the so-called "Thomas amendment", which, as I understand it, embodies the administration's proposal for changes in our currency system.

President Roosevelt's program for inflation reminds me of nothing so much as a child playing with dynamite. He is trying to make prices go up. He may succeed. The trouble is that in doing so he may destroy the country and himself as well.

To tamper with the currency is like lighting the fuse of a high explosive and standing by to see what happens. If the fuse sputters and dies, nothing happens; and in the case of the President's program nothing would be accomplished. If it reaches the explosive, things happen rapidly and with destructive effect. The whole history of inflationary experiments in other countries shows that it is almost as impossible to control inflation set in motion by printing-press money, following the abandonment of the gold standard, as it is to keep a charge of nitroglycerine in check when the burning fuse reaches it.

There are 30,000,000 households in the United States. Every one of these would suffer immediately in the rise in the cost of living. It would be felt in the grocery bill, the fuel bill, the clothing bill, in the cost of transportation, insurance, education, and every other item entering into the family budget.

There are 50,000,000 savings accounts in the United States. As prices rise each savings-bank depositor, each person with money in the bank or in a building and loan association, loses money daily by simply keeping his money on deposit.

There are 122,000,000 life-insurance policies in force in the United States. Millions of policyholders are wholly dependent on the proceeds of these policies to educate their children or to provide for their own old age. The value of these policies goes down with the dollar, and exactly to the same extent, as the policies are payable in dollars. As prices rise and the dollar is worth less, the insurance policy is worth less, the prospective annuity disappears, and the carefully saved educational fund with it. There are millions of boys and girls whose college careers are wrapped up in these policies. Many of them would be denied an education if the dollar drops in value.

There are 48,000,000 persons gainfully employed in the United States. There are 10,000,000 in agriculture, 14,000,000 in manufacturing industries, 6,100,000 in trade, 4,000,000 in transportation and commerce, 4,000,000 in clerical employment, 5,000,000 in personal service, 3,000,000 in professional pursuits, and 1,000,000 in mining. Every man who draws a pay envelope or receives a pay check would suffer an immediate wage cut, probably followed by further reductions, as the dollar declined in value and the cost of living rose.

There were in February 4,100,000 families, including approximately 17,000,000 persons, directly dependent on public or private relief agencies in the United States. They would get less to eat and wear or it would cost the country more to feed and clothe them as prices rose. They cannot be allowed to starve or to go unclothed. That means taxes would rise and the Government would have to pour billions more into relief funds.

It is contended by advocates of inflation that it would help the farmer by raising the prices received for his crops. How would the farmer benefit if wheat sold for $10 a bushel and the $10 would not buy a pair of overalls or a gallon of gasoline?

There have been fewer marriages in the United States during the last 2 years than at any time for 10 years past, due directly to the depression. These deferred marriages represent a huge backlog of building, of house furnishing, of buying of all kinds, ready to be released as business improves and certainty as to the future is restored. Is it to be assumed that a rapid rise in living costs will encourage or discourage marriage? I think the answer is obvious. If these young people cannot be married now, how could they marry with prices skyrocketing and their earnings lagging behind, as is always the case in inflation? Fear of the future will continue. Marriages will continue to be deferred.

Russia inflated her currency. The old ruble has disappeared. The new Russian ruble, or chervonetz, has a fluctuating value in different parts of Russia, and no fixed value anywhere. Hunger and misery are widespread in Russia, not only in the cities but in the country districts. They are trying so desperately to get enough gold to stabilize their currency that it is said by our newspapers this week that Russian dentists are now using steel instead of gold in filling teeth.

Germany approached inflation gradually over a period of several years. Like a snowball rolling down a mountain, it gathered volume and momentum as it went along until in the final smash at the bottom it buried everyone in an avalanche of worthless money. Toward the end it took a million marks to buy a loaf of bread; and one good American dollar, with gold back of it, would have bought enough paper marks to extinguish the entire German national debt. In the end they swept up the valueless currency, baled it, and sold it for waste paper, eventually establishing a new currency based on gold borrowed from the United States and other countries which had been wiser in their fiscal policies.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In line with the Senator's argument, may I present him, with my compliments, a hundred billion German marks, which, at face value, would have retired the entire American national debt, but which, unfortunately, finally was worth only 2½ cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I shall be glad to pay him in Russian rubles. I hand him a note for 10,000 Russian rubles. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think we are even.

Mr. REED. Germany today is impoverished and there is as much unemployment and more suffering, proportionately, in Germany than there is in the United States.

England went off the gold standard on September 21, 1931, expecting to improve her trade position. This expectation has not been realized. British trade shows no perceptible improvement. Her shipping is in as bad a plight as it could be. All reports from England, and the indices of British trade as of the present time, indicate that she gained nothing and lost much by this action. Necessary or not, it is obvious that England lost enormously in prestige, and that with the depreciation of the pound sterling the banking center of the world moved definitely from London to New York.

If we now inflate our currency, lower the gold content of the dollar, or experiment in any other way with what has been one of the few sound currencies in the world, we, in turn, will risk losing our dominant position in world trade and world finance—a position which at present permits us to dictate terms to other nations less favorably situated.

England eventually will have to come back to gold. I do not think the United States should ever abandon the gold standard, except as the existing emergency suggests the wisdom of temporarily suspending gold payments. I offer no criticism of the embargo on gold shipments. It seems to me that it was wise, prudent, proper action to take at the time. I offer no criticism of the suspension of specie payments within the United States, as was done on the 4th of March; but my criticism does go, with all the earnestness that is in me, to the proposals that were sent to us yesterday afternoon, and were embodied in the Thomas amendment.

Inflation is the process by which governments throw off responsibility and go on a jamboree. They pursue a picturesque course for a while, but they wake up with a headache. This is the thing for the sober men and women of America to remember when inflation is proposed. There may be a temporary exhilaration, but there is always a "morning after."

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this matter at this time; and yet I cannot refrain from calling attention to the fact that the attitude of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and his former administration has not changed a particle. They were opposed for 3 years to devaluating the dollar. They are opposed now to devaluating the dollar. The fact that the dollar today will buy twice as much of products as it would when his administration went in 4 years ago does not concern him at all. He is pleased with it. He sees nothing whatever that is terrible in the existing condition.

The fact that the farmer who borrowed a thousand dollars when wheat was $1 a bushel, and he could pay his thousand-dollar loan with a thousand bushels of wheat, now has to pay it with 2,000 bushels of wheat, does not concern the Senator from Pennsylvania at all. He would be totally unwilling to have the dollar devaluated 50 percent so that the debtor would be able to pay with the same amount of products that he would have had to pay with when he contracted the debt.

We have exactly the same thing now that we had before. The Senator's Republican administration for 3 years made the same speeches: "Let things alone." They were fine. It was all right. The Senator comes here now and argues that the man who has money will lose if the dollar is reduced in purchasing power. Of course he will lose. A man's dollar today will buy twice what it would buy before the Republican administration went in. There are 30,000,000 people in this country who are dependent on farming, who, by reason of the high price of the dollar, cannot raise enough commodities, at the cost to them of raising those commodities, to pay the expense of their production.

The Senator speaks for the few people who have some money. He does not speak for the 30,000,000 people in this country dependent on farming who are ruined by the increased value of the dollar. He does not speak for the 13,000,000 men who are out of jobs and have not anything at all with which to buy, nor the 13,000,000 of old people and children dependent on the 13,000,000 idle laborers who have not anything with which to buy.

The Senator cannot get out of his mind the cause of the man who has, when the cause of the men who has not is the problem before the United States today. It is the same old issue. If the dollar is devaluated in its purchasing power, the fellow who has it is going to have to pay more for what he gets. That is the argument. He will have to pay more for the potatoes that he eats; he will have to pay more for the wheat that he eats; he will have to pay more for the cotton that he wears, or the wool that he wears. Therefore, if he has to pay more for it, it is an injury to the man who has money.

I admit that. That is a pure, simple proposition. It has been the issue for 4 years. It is the issue now; but, thank God! the people of this country woke up to the issue at the last election, and they are not ignorant of the issue today.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me when they woke up?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; at the last election. Perhaps the Senator did not wake up then.

Mr. REED. The Democratic national platform declared for a sound currency. Does the Senator think that to issue greenbacks to retire Government bonds is a sound currency?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is just the way the old Republican Party always argue. They construe everything to mean that their money shall be twice as valuable as the country intended that it shall be. "A sound currency!"

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a second, until I finish this thought.

This amendment provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President or by his direction, may enter into an agreement with the Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board that such banks shall enter into open-market Government bond and security purchases to the extent of $3,000,000,000 and that they shall buy Treasury bills within that $3,000,000,000. That is that part of the amendment; but what was attempted on that line? Under the existing law we tried to induce the Federal Reserve banks to aid in inflation and expansion of credit. They did not do it. They said they could not do it. Then we passed the Steagall-Glass bill. Why? Because we wanted to increase the eligible paper of member banks—which was already $5,000,000,000—to $10,000,000,000, in the hope that the Federal Reserve System, the existing instrumentality, would expand not merely three billions but whatever was necessary; but it proved an utter failure. Only $125,000,000 was expanded under that act.

Now we come back to them, and we say to them, "If you will issue the three billions in open-market transactions, as you have the power to do, and will buy Treasury bills, as you have the power to do, then, if that meets the condition, that ends it."

Mr. REED. The Senator is talking about one of the least harmful provisions of the Thomas amendment; but if he will start on page 3, in line 15, he will find a part that I think even he cannot defend. It provides for the issuance of $3,000,000,000 of totally unsecured greenbacks for the purpose of buying in outstanding securities; and that, Mr. President, is proposed 10 days before the Treasury is going to have to go into the market to sell a new refunding issue; and the adoption of that part of the amendment will utterly destroy the market for Government bonds. It will be necessary to force them on the Federal Reserve banks, because the public will not buy a nickel's worth of them.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; we heard that for 3 years, and we heard only about 2 weeks ago that if any such inflation was even proposed, instead of the market for commodities going up it would probably go down. We heard that there was going to be wild excitement; but let me get back to that provision and show the Senator that he is not quite accurate now, even if this amendment should be enacted. I think I remember the amendment. I had something to do with assisting in drafting it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me finish this branch of the discussion, and then I will yield to the Senator.

We are not issuing three billions of greenbacks. I answer that categorically as absolutely inaccurate.

Mr. REED. Why does the Senator put in the power to issue them, if we are not going to do it?

Mr. PITTMAN. I say, if we issue them, the Senator is inaccurate. The three billions that we issue in the first place will withdraw obligations of our Government of an equal amount. That is all that they can be issued for—maturing obligations of our Government to the extent of $3,000,000,000. That is not all. They cannot be used for current expenses. Again, the same amendment provides for a sinking fund of 4 percent of the outstanding note issue which would redeem them in any event in 25 years.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Redeem them in 25 years without interest; and the Senator considers that sound money!

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not sound money to a banker, because he would not do anything without interest, and an awful lot of it; but I say it is perfectly sound as far as economics is concerned.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. In just a minute. I say that when we issue non-interest-bearing obligations to take up an interest-bearing obligation the obligations of the Government are less; and when we provide a sinking fund of 4 percent to retire the notes that have taken the place of those bonds, which are to be retired and canceled, we do a sound economic act.

Mr. REED. If that is so, then why is it not sound to issue greenbacks to pay the entire outstanding American debt?

Mr. PITTMAN. If we issued greenbacks, as in 1862, the act would be subject to the charge of unlimited inflation, but in this case we will have only $3,000,000,000 through the Federal Reserve banks and possibly $3,000,000,000 more through the Treasury.

Mr. REED. And the Senator really thinks that the $3,000,000,000 limit will not be enlarged if we launch upon this experiment?

Mr. PITTMAN. It will not be enlarged if the opinion of the experts who have been advising the Republican Party for years is sound—that is, if that is sufficient to prime the pump. If that $3,000,000,000 is sufficient to reestablish a sufficient rise in commodity prices to call private capital into the market, there will never be any necessity for a further issue by the Treasury.

Mr. REED. The Senator approves, then, of the $3,000,000,000 limit?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Why was it not put into the plan until yesterday afternoon?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know. There were a number of things put into it yesterday afternoon.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator happen to know that the President was expecting to send us that section with no limit in it whatever?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know anything of the kind. I know that he was not expecting to send us anything until it was completed, and I know that it was not completed, and that there was no final determination on it, until 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon. I know that to be a fact. If the Senator knows any more about what the President intended to do, I would like to have his information.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield first to the Senator from Florida, who rose some time ago.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has made reference to greenbacks, and there have been a number of slurring remarks about greenbacks. Have we any better money in this country today than greenbacks? What are they talking about? Three hundred million dollars of greenbacks, with $156,000,000 of gold in reserve.

Mr. REED. Precisely; and not one penny of gold is going to be behind these bills, call them greenbacks or not, as you please.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and there is only 4 percent of gold behind $120,000,000,000 of promises to pay in gold in this country, and everyone knows now that they never will be paid in gold if gold is demanded. The world knows it. There is 4 percent of gold behind the obligations, which was ample when people believed it was ample. Five hundred million dollars in our money in Great Britain, in the Bank of England, was ample for all the great credit of Great Britain as long as people believed it was ample. A reserve of 20 percent or 25 percent in a bank as against deposits is ample as long as depositors believe it is ample. But I say this, that when the discussion of war debts started throughout the world, and people understood what a small quantity of gold there was, and what a tremendous pyramiding of obligations burdened it, they doubted whether there was enough to pay such obligations. I hope that the time will come back when confidence will be sufficiently restored so that people and governments will believe that there is enough gold to meet normal current demands, and that unnecessary demands will not be made.

Mr. REED. The Senator has touched on a most interesting subject, and I wish that he would enlighten us as to this: Is it the intention of the Roosevelt administration to repudiate the promise to pay in gold which is contained in all of our outstanding Federal bonds?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have never heard anything that would indicate to my mind any such intention.

Mr. REED. Then it is expected that the Government will pay those bonds and their interest in one kind of dollars while we collect taxes in another kind. Is that the intention?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator knows well enough that there would not be the embargoes on gold now, and he knows well enough that there would not be the demand that gold be put in the Treasury now, if it were not known that it is impossible now, and perhaps will be for years impossible—certainly during this emergency—to redeem all Government obligations in gold. The Senator knows that.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator regards that promise as impossible of fulfillment, does he?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am afraid that it is impossible, under existing conditions throughout the world——

Mr. REED. The American people will be very sorry to hear that.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know they will be sorry to hear it; but the Senator asked me for my personal opinion. I believe that it is essential that this race throughout the world for the depreciation of currencies, for economic advantage which the countries obtain through depreciation of currencies, has to stop or there will be an end absolutely to anything except managed currencies, without relation to other currencies, which may bring international trade to the disappearing point.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator that the race between managed and constantly diminishing currencies has to stop, and that is why I am particularly sorry to see the United States launch into that race at this time.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that the United States should not enter into a conference without every legitimate protection behind our Government. The United States never has used any power it was not necessary to use, and in my opinion it never will use any power it is not necessary to use; but I think that we would do a disservice to our Government and our people, and that we would be unpatriotic, if we sent our Government economically disarmed into any conference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I was detained from the Chamber, and I want to ask the Senator before he takes his seat, in case he has not covered the matter, how much inflation is possible under this amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should say that under the amendment inflation would be possible to the extent of $6,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. That must depend upon the proposition of securing the consent of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am stating that as a possibility. If the Federal Reserve Board performed its banking functions, and used its money to buy Government securities to the amount of $3,000,000,000, and that restored conditions of credit in this country, that would be the end of it. If it did not perform its function, then the additional power would reside in the President, when he found that to be a fact, to cause to be issued $3,000,000,000 more of notes for the purpose of meeting maturities of Government obligations.

Mr. BORAH. But if we reach the conclusion that the Federal Reserve Board will not agree with the President on the first proposition, then the full amount of inflation which this amendment would provide would be $3,000,000,000, would it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. That would be the limit of it.

Mr. BORAH. That is about two billions less than has been frozen in the banks since the 1st of March. That seems to me moderate inflation.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Is it not true that the Federal Reserve Board is appointed by the President of the United States, and therefore can he not have the Federal Reserve Board practically agree to anything he wishes?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Federal Reserve Board cannot make the Federal Reserve banks agree to anything, because they are individual banks, and the Senator must know that.

Mr. BORAH. Before this first provision of the amendment would go into operation, there must be consent on the part of the 12 directorships of the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Reserve Board in addition to that. In my opinion, judging the future by the past, it would be most difficult if not impossible to secure that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to answer that?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator will have a fine chance to determine its impossibility on May 2, when the next issue of refunding securities will have to be made by our Treasury. The public will not buy them. The Federal Reserve banks are going to be dragooned into taking them, and we will see whether they will withhold their consent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in view of the past, we need have no uneasiness about the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal Reserve directorships consenting to anything which would lead to any degree of inflation whatever. My doubt as to this amendment is that it does not provide sufficient inflation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall that in the emergency act we provided for practically $2,000,000,000 of inflation, and that $2,000,000,000 was printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and is now down here on the shelf. Only 23 million of the $2,000,000,000 has ever been called for, because banks through whom it was expected to be put into circulation have not asked for its use, because they will not make loans to people. In addition to that, there has been all along possible an inflation of about $4,000,000,000, prior to the passage of the Emergency Banking Act, but due to conditions, to the lack of confidence, and to the fear which has existed among the people, among bankers and business men and everybody else, none of that money has gotten into circulation. The object of this amendment, as I understand it, is to create a currency which will find its way into circulation among the people and thereby perform the duty intended to be performed by all the possible currency for which we have provided in bills we have passed heretofore. Am I correct about that?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think so. I agree with the Senator, at least.

Mr. President, I wish to say this: I think we have disposed of the greenback question, because there will be as much behind the proposed notes as there is behind our bonds, because there is to be an amortization fund to pay off the notes. The only difference between the Treasury notes and a bond is that the bond draws interest and people make money out of it. But the bond does not serve the purpose of a circulating medium, and it is of far more benefit to the people of this country in this period of deflation that they have a circulating medium than that they have bonds locked up.

This currency—whether it is issued through the instrumentalities of the Federal Reserve System or, upon their failure to issue it, is issued directly by the Treasury—is to take up maturing obligations of the Government. It is taking an interest-bearing bond and substituting a non-interest-bearing bond with the power of circulation.

I know that we have had to argue time and time again the question as to whether or not there was enough circulating media in this country. We are constantly met with the statement that there is ample circulating currency in the country. But let us leave out the question of circulating currency. We will assume that there is $4,400,000,000 of gold currency in circulation in the country. Let us assume that. Where is it? If it is in the Treasury of the United States, it is called from circulation; but if it is held in banks which are carrying 60 or 70 percent of their reserves against their deposits, it might as well be in the Treasury; because it is not circulating among the people, although termed by the Treasury "technically in circulation."

Of course, we all admit that one of the great circulating mediums of this country is checks on deposits. But we know that the turnover in checks since 1929 up until very recently—I do not know what they have been in the last few days, but up until very recently—was only about one fourth of what it was in 1929. So that much of our circulating media was put out of existence in this country.

With the existing currency tied up in banks to the extent of three times what it was in 1929, and our check turnover reduced three fourths by reason of there being no investment a depositor can make that will give an indication of profit, and our banks refusing to lend because property values have been falling, it appears unreasonable to denounce such limited expansion of currency as unlimited inflation.

We have all come to the point, we have nearly all agreed on it, that we cannot start the restoration in this country until we start a rise in commodity prices. Today, caused by the hope of the possible passage of this legislation, we find all commodities of this country enhanced in value, we see the price of wheat and cotton and other farm products and nearly everything else rising. Is that such a terrible calamity? Is it a terrible calamity that somebody has to pay a little more for the wheat he eats and the cotton he wears? Yet that is the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania—that the man who has money has to pay more for the things he enjoys.

I just wish to say one more thing about that. I do not think that any intelligent, advised statesman believes in unlimited inflation. I agree with everything the Senator has said with regard to those examples of unlimited inflation, such as the case of the German mark. If he cannot draw a distinction between the power of the Treasury of Germany to issue unlimited paper marks and this measure, which authorizes a limit of $3,000,000,000, allowing it to be used only for the retiring and canceling of an equal number of maturing outstanding Government obligations, and providing a sinking fund which will retire and cancel all those notes within 25 years, then it is totally impossible to explain to anyone in this country who is in favor of holding the purchasing power of money high, as the Senator is an able and intelligent man.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, has the Senator any facts that would determine the reserve which is held by the banking institutions of the country at the present time?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; we have reports on them. We very frequently have such reports. We had a report here the other day from the banks in New York, which indicated that those banks were carrying about 66 percent reserve. Such reports are being published all the time and they may be obtained from the Treasury Department every day.

In the discussion of this bill Senators are arguing a proposition which is called "inflation" and are trying to convince the people that it is similar to the action of Germany in relation to the mark, when there is no foundation whatever for the statement. The unfortunate thing about such statements is that this is the first relief that the people of the country have had in over 3 years, for it is a relief when we find wheat going up and cotton going up and meat products going up to a point where their price is almost reaching the cost of production. That result will encourage the people to take their deposits out of the banks and to use them. God knows, no one can argue that the deposits of the banks ought not to be used; but they will not be used except on a rising market.

It looks as though Senators maintaining the position of opposition to this policy would like to crush even the little increase in commodity prices that has taken place. The speech of the Senator is the old-fashioned scare speech. He compares the present condition to the most dire things which have happened in regard to inflated currency issues, such as happened to the German mark, when there is nothing on earth in this proposed amendment that justifies any relation to that situation whatsoever. We find the same old crowd around the Senate who were kicked out of the Government. We find the "greatest Secretary since Hamilton" casting his shadow around the Office Building; we find the next greatest Secretary since Hamilton, whose resignation was recently accepted by the Government of the United States as Secretary of the Treasury, casting his shadow again athwart our office buildings. What for? To maintain the magnificent prosperity of their administration under the same rules and laws and policies?

There is no use in fighting this proposal. This country demands cheaper money, and, with the aid of these able men who know banking, we can get cheaper money without running the risk of excessive inflation; but if Senators who are now opposing this proposal are successful in defeating it or long delay its inauguration, they will be responsible for a condition that may be far worse than conservative inflation. In any event, however, we are going to have cheaper money. We are not going to make it necessary to produce 2 bushels of wheat in order to buy a dollar. We are not going any longer to require 25 pounds of cotton to buy a dollar. We are going to have a reasonable adjustment of prices as they were for 8 or 10 years in this country. That level is going to be brought about in spite of the opposition of Senators who resist this policy, and their scares and their efforts and their illogical and false comparisons are going to have no effect whatever on the proposed legislation.

Those Senators should be happy, they should be contented that there has been so much conservatism, so much care, so many safeguards thrown about the inflation. It were possible, under the dire suffering of the people, that they could have gone to wild inflation. When 30,000,000 people have suffered, not for 3 years but for 7 years, by reason of the prices of farm products being so low, by reason of the fact that their commodities would not buy enough dollars to pay their taxes and interest; when 13,000,000 idle men and women, with 13,000,000 dependents, are suffering; when a majority of the people of the country are in poverty and in distress, I say that Senators in opposition should congratulate the administration and should aid the administration in this conservative and safe approach toward inflation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada has made a splendid reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], but there were some statements made by the Senator from Pennsylvania which I wish to challenge.

The Senator from Pennsylvania bases much of his argument on the desire of protecting policyholders and investors in savings banks. He has stated that if we reduce the value of the dollar we shall imperil the man who has an insurance policy and will imperil the depositor in the savings bank. I want to remind the Senator from Pennsylvania that the holder of the insurance policy to whom he refers is already imperiled. But for the assistance of the Government the insurance companies would be in liquidation, as many of them are today. Why? Because their money is invested in farm mortgages and in home mortgages, and the values of real estate have gone down and down and down so that today, if the insurance companies of the United States, on the present value of the dollar, should liquidate, the holder of an insurance policy would not get the value of his policy, and the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to know that. Otherwise, why was it necessary for the Government to step in and finance the insurance companies in order to keep them from going into bankruptcy?

The Senator says that we must save the savings-bank depositors. But for the help of the Government the savings banks of this Republic would now be in the hands of receivers, as many of them are. Why? Because their money was invested in securities the prices of which were inflated because of the high dollar, the bloated dollar, the dropsical dollar, the diseased dollar. We speak of a "sound" dollar. No dollar is sound when it is bloated and extended to three times its purchasing power when the debts based upon that dollar were contracted. That is what would happen to the savings banks and insurance companies today if they were liquidated on the present value of the American dollar.

What about the deposits in the ordinary commercial banks of the country? Are they not entitled to some consideration? Let me remind the Senator from Pennsylvania that the reason banks have closed, the reason they are now in the hands of receivers, the reason they are in the hands of conservators is because of what? It is because their debtors, the people who owe the banks, cannot pay the banks their notes. Why? Because they contracted those debts on high values of commodities and on high values of securities, and now, due to the enhancement of the value of the dollar, they are unable to pay those debts because the value of their products has declined, the value of their real estate has declined, and so the reason that depositors in commercial banks throughout the Republic are suffering today is because of the high and exaggerated value of the dollar.

Let me ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, are not the depositors in ordinary banks entitled to some consideration? Is it only the savings-bank depositor that is entitled to his money at 100 percent?—no; not a hundred percent, but 250 percent, because the dollar now, in many cases, will buy in commodities 250 percent of what it would buy when those deposits were made.

The Senator from Pennsylvania contends that if we adopt any measure which will lower the value of the American dollar America will lose its dominating position in world trade. Mr. President, there has been no one more insistent than the Senator from Pennsylvania in declaring that America has lost its position in world trade because of the depreciated currencies of foreign countries. In the last Congress the Senator from Pennsylvania was repeatedly demanding that we lift the tariff walls against Europe higher and higher and higher on the plea that the countries of Europe, because of their depreciated currencies, were flooding our markets, taking away our foreign trade, and driving the American manufacturer and the American laboring man out of the market. Senators will bear witness to what I declare.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has repeatedly on this floor asserted that the fall of European currencies was ruining American foreign trade and ruining the American manufacturer because of the increase in our imports. Let the Senator consult the figures of the Department of Commerce which show that, relatively speaking, American imports are increasing and American exports are decreasing. What does that mean? It means that foreigners, through depreciation of their currencies, are injuring American trade abroad and our prices at home. The lifting of our money is the same as the lowering of their money. If we can put the value of the dollar down more nearly to the level of their currencies we shall correct that situation and may, in some part, regain the position which the Senator from Pennsylvania says we lately lost.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator the question which I asked the Senator from Nevada. How much inflation does the Senator think there is in this bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. That depends, I shall say to the Senator from Idaho, of course, on how far the power granted is exercised.

Mr. BORAH. There is a limit to it, whatever power may be exercised.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure, but within that limit it depends. For instance, one clause provides that about $3,000,000,000 of securities and notes may be issued, and, under another clause, the President may reduce the gold content of the dollar. If he should reduce the gold content of the dollar, of course there would be an increase of circulation, an increase of currency, because of the lessening of the value of gold in the dollar and the increase of the gold reserve in the Treasury.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator can make no estimate as to how much inflation we might have?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not care to make an estimate because I do not really have information that is accurate, nor can I foretell the extent to which the powers may be exercised.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in a few minutes I expect to submit the report to the Senate on the so-called "Thomas amendment." There is a provision inserted by the committee to the effect that the Federal Reserve Board shall have the power to increase or decrease the reserves required by the Federal Reserve banks. That will of itself check inflation, if a check shall be needed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has answered the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator from Florida did not answer the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was not able to hear what the Senator from Florida said, but, noting the contented look on the face of the Senator from Idaho, I assumed that the Senator from Florida had answered his question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I merely mentioned a provision added by the committee which will constitute a check.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As a partial answer to the question submitted by the Senator from Idaho, there is a possible inflation of the currency under the first paragraph of the amendment of a maximum amount of $3,000,000,000. What other expansion may take place, if any, will depend upon the application of the amendment by the President.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that there could be expansion of $3,000,000,000 under the first clause if the President and the Reserve Board should agree, and under the second clause, if the President should see fit, he could issue $3,000,000,000 of currency notes. That would make $6,000,000,000 all told. That is what I have assumed to be the sum total of inflation which could take place. My opinion is that about $3,000,000,000 is what will take place. There is little reason to assume that the Federal banks and the Federal Board will consent to inflation in any respect.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I will say that under this bill, as I understand it, first there can be an expansion of $3,000,000,000 under clause 1 and, second, an expansion of $3,000,000,000 under clause 2. Then the bill gives the President the right to reduce the gold content of the dollar to 50 cents, which would double the total amount of currency outstanding.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Idaho let me add, suppose we should inflate to the extent of $6,000,000,000; we will not then have done much more than to regain the ground which was lost by the closing of the banks. There are now approximately $6,000,000,000 of bank deposits frozen in the closed banks of the country.

Mr. BORAH. I would not have the Senator think that I am alarmed over the amount of the expansion. I do not think it is excessive. I have had little opportunity to study the measure, but my first impression is that in its practical effect there will be but moderate inflation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I so understood the Senator a while ago.

Mr. President, to those who are fearful of wild inflation such as the Senator from Pennsylvania suggested, such as that which occurred in Germany and Russia, let it be known that there are safeguards in this measure and that it is impossible to enter upon any such campaign of wild inflation as ever was dreamed of in those countries. Where is the gold of America? It is locked up. We have the largest gold reserve in the world. It is locked up to redeem America's obligations and to guarantee the payment of America's currency. It is locked up and there is an embargo on it. Does anybody fear that that reserve is going to be dissipated? Of course not. That reserve will remain here for use of the Government.

The Senator from Pennsylvania complains about paper money. He voted for the Glass-Steagall bill, which provided for the issuance of paper money secured by Government bonds, which is comparable in some respects to the provisions of this measure. He fears the issuance of paper currency, but he voted, I am sure, for the Borah amendment, which provided for the issuance of currency by the national banks upon the security of Government bonds alone. That is what is provided in this measure in one of its features.

According to the theory of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the country would be better off if commodities went still lower, because the savings banks' depositors would get more on their savings, the life insurance policy beneficiaries would get more from the holder's estate. Talk about the increased cost of living! What about the millions of people in America who are toiling on the farms and ranches and in other occupations that do not yield a livelihood? Are not they entitled to some consideration? Is all the consideration to be given to the industrial workers, to the savings-bank depositors, to the life-insurance policyholders?

The Senator from Pennsylvania and other Senators know that the dollar now, on its present valuation measured by commodities, is not a sound dollar. They know it is not a just dollar. They know it is not a fair dollar. They know it is not an honest dollar.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania also said that Great Britain had not achieved any advantage by going off the gold standard. He has contradicted his own argument which he made heretofore that she has helped her trade and is not going back on the gold standard until she is well prepared to do so unless by international agreement.

Mr. President, I wanted to make these observations in reply to statements made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. He represents that particular school of thought that wants to stand still. The administration of Mr. Hoover, largely under the leadership of the Senator from Pennsylvania, undertook to inflate, but not with money. It undertook to inflate with credit. It produced the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which proposed to raise prices and revive business by taking the Government's money and handing it over to borrowers who would take it to the banks and pay their debts, and as a result there was no inflation at all because it was simply a transfer of the obligations from that class of creditors to the United States Treasury, and when the banks got the money they locked it up in their vaults and refused to lend it. The Hoover policy of inflation did not work for the common good. It worked only for the benefit of those people who got money out of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The Senator from Pennsylvania believes in the doctrine of "stand still and do nothing." The power of the Government ought to be exerted within its constitutional limits whenever the necessities of the situation require affirmative action. With foreign governments depreciating their currency, beating the United States in the matter of world trade, cutting down our exports and increasing our imports, hammering down the prices of our exportable wheat and cotton and the products of our factories, fields, and ranches, if the Government of the United States is indifferent to the needs of its own people and does not attempt to exercise its powers to meet those conditions and offset this campaign against American finance and American business, then we ought to adjourn the Senate and go home.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. For what purpose, may I inquire?

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, certainly; I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to House bill 3835, the farm relief bill, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 40) thereon.

The report was ordered to be printed and to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 40, Seventy-third Congress, first session]

CURRENCY AMENDMENT TO FARM RELIEF BILL

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following report to accompany amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to H.R. 3835:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the amendment (relating to the currency) intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the proposal do pass. However, the committee recommend that the proposal be not attached as an amendment to the agricultural bill (H.R. 3835), but that it should be passed as a separate measure.

The amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma as proposed to be modified is as follows:

[Omit the part in black brackets and insert the part in italic]

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, viz: On page 43, after line 5, insert:

"PART 6. FINANCING—AND EXERCISING POWER CONFERRED BY SECTION 8 OF ARTICLE I OF THE CONSTITUTION: TO COIN MONEY AND TO REGULATE THE VALUE THEREOF

"SEC. 34. Whenever the President finds, upon investigation, that (1) the foreign commerce of the United States is adversely affected by reason of the depreciation in the value of the currency of any other government or governments in relation to the present standard value of gold, or (2) action under this section is necessary in order to regulate and maintain the parity of currency issues of the United States, or (3) [that] an economic emergency requires an expansion of credit, or (4) [that] an expansion of credit is necessary to secure by international agreement a stabilization at proper levels of the currencies of various governments, the President is authorized, in his discretion—

"(a) To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into agreements with the several Federal Reserve banks and with the Federal Reserve Board whereby the Federal Reserve Board will, and it is hereby authorized to, notwithstanding any provisions of law or rules and regulations to the contrary, permit such reserve banks to agree that they will, (1) conduct, pursuant to existing law, throughout specified periods, open-market operations in obligations of the [Federal] United States Government or corporations in which the United States is the [principal] majority stockholder, and (2) purchase directly and hold in portfolio for an agreed period or periods of time Treasury bills or other obligations of the United States Government in an aggregate sum of $3,000,000,000 in addition to those they may then hold, unless prior to the termination of such period or periods the Secretary shall consent to their sale. No suspension of reserve requirements of the Federal Reserve banks, under the terms of section 11[–c] (c) of the Federal Reserve Act, necessitated by reason of operations under this section, shall require the imposition of the graduated tax upon any deficiency in reserves as provided in said section 11[–c] (c). Nor shall it require any automatic increase in the rates of interest or discount charged by any Federal Reserve bank, as otherwise specified in that section. The Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may require the Federal Reserve banks to take such action as may be necessary, in the judgment of the Board and of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prevent undue credit expansion.

"(b) If the Secretary, when directed by the President, is unable to secure the assent of the several Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board to the agreements authorized in this section, or if operations under the above provisions prove to be inadequate to meet the purposes of this section [of this act], or if for any other reason additional measures are required in the judgment of the President to meet such purposes, then [he] the President is authorized—

"(1) To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued in such amount or amounts as he may from time to time order, United States notes, as provided in the act entitled 'An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption of funding thereof and for funding the floating debt of the United States', approved February 25, 1862, and acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, in the same size and of similar color to the Federal Reserve notes heretofore issued and in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, and $10,000; but notes issued under this subsection shall be issued only for the purpose of meeting maturing Federal obligations to repay sums borrowed by the United States and for purchasing United States bonds and other interest-bearing obligations of the United States: Provided, That when any such notes are used for such purpose the bond or other obligation so acquired or taken up shall be retired and canceled. Such notes shall be issued at such times and in such amounts as the President may approve but the aggregate amount of such notes outstanding at any time shall not exceed $3,000,000,000. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to retire and cancel 4 percent annually of such outstanding notes, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to retire and cancel annually 4 percent of such outstanding notes. Such notes and all other coins and currencies heretofore or hereafter coined or issued by or under the authority of the United States shall be legal tender for all debts public and private.

"(2) By proclamation to fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains nine tenths fine at an amount that he finds is necessary from his investigation to protect the foreign commerce of the United States against the adverse effect of depreciated foreign currencies, or in case the Government of the United States enters into an agreement with any government or governments under the terms of which the ratio between the value of gold and other currency issued by the United States and by any such government or governments is established, the President may fix the weight of the gold dollar in accordance with the ratio so agreed upon, and such gold dollar, the weight of which is so fixed, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity with this standard and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity, but in no event shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed so as to reduce its present weight by more than 50 percent.

"SEC. 35. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to make and promulgate rules and regulations covering any action taken or to be taken by the President under subsection (a) or (b) of section 34.

"SEC. 36. (a) The President of the United States is authorized to accept silver, in amounts not to exceed in the aggregate in value in the United States currency $100,000,000, in payment of the whole or any part of any amount of principal or interest due from any foreign government or governments on account of any indebtedness to our Government, such silver to be accepted at not to exceed the price of 50 cents an ounce. The authority of the President to accept silver as herein authorized shall be limited to a period of not to exceed 1 year from the passage of this act.

"(b) The silver bullion [purchased] accepted and received under the provisions of this section shall be subject to the requirements of existing law and the regulations of the mint service governing the methods of determining the amount of pure silver contained, and the amount of the charges or deductions, if any, to be made; but such silver bullion shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion authorized or required to be purchased and coined under the provisions of existing law.

"(c) The silver accepted and received under the provisions of this section shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to be held, used, and disposed of as in this section provided.

"(d) The President shall cause silver certificates to be issued in denominations of $1, to the total number of dollars for which such silver was accepted in payment of debts. Such silver certificates shall be used by the Treasurer of the United States in payment of any obligations of the United States.

"(e) The silver so accepted and received under this section shall be coined into standard silver dollars and subsidiary coins sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet any demands for redemption of such silver certificates issued under the provisions of this section, and such coins shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of such certificates on demand. The silver so [obtained and deposited] accepted and received under this section, except so much thereof as is coined under the provisions of this section, shall be held in the Treasury for the sole purpose of aiding in maintaining the parity of such certificates as provided in existing law. Any such certificates or reissued certificates, when presented at the Treasury, shall be redeemed in standard silver dollars, or in subsidiary silver coin, at the option of the holder of the certificates: Provided, That, in the redemption of such silver certificates issued under this section, not to exceed one third of the coin required for such redemption may in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury be made in subsidiary coins, the balance to be made in standard silver dollars.

"(f) When any silver certificates issued under the provisions of this section are redeemed or received into the Treasury from any source whatsoever, and belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation; but nothing herein shall prevent the cancelation and destruction of mutilated certificates and the issue of other certificates of like denomination in their stead, as provided by law.

"(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this section.

"SEC. 37. Section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by inserting immediately after paragraph (c) thereof the following new paragraph:

"Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, the Federal Reserve Board, upon affirmative vote of not less than five of its members and with the approval of the President may declare that an emergency exists by reason of credit expansion, and may by regulation during such emergency increase or decrease from time to time, in its discretion, the reserve balances required to be maintained against either demand or time deposits."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield for a brief statement in connection with the report just made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas for that purpose?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, an interesting and perhaps important question has been raised with respect to the subject matter of the amendment just reported by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. That question is whether the Senate shall proceed to consider the amendment referred to as an amendment to the pending farm bill or shall treat it as a separate measure. It is expected by the proponents of the amendment that it will be offered as a provision in the pending bill.

There are some reasons which may be stated in justification of this policy. In the first place, there is pending now an informal conference of the very greatest importance preliminary to the international economic conference which is expected to be held in the early future.

If anything is to be accomplished in connection with the stabilization of exchange and of foreign currencies, it is desirable that the authority of the President be defined as soon as practicable. The President feels that it would be of great value and assistance to him to have this amendment considered and disposed of as soon as may be found practicable, to the end that he may know and that others interested in the conference may know the extent of his authority, to the further end that he may be assisted and supported in making arrangements which it is believed are of first importance to the commerce of the United States, to domestic conditions as well, and for that matter to the business situation in various parts of the world.

It is not expected that the amendment will be acted upon without fair consideration by the Senate. It is anticipated, however, in view of what has been stated by certain Senators as reported in the press, that if a deliberate filibuster is undertaken in connection with the amendment, the Senate will avail itself of the opportunity to terminate that filibuster under its rules.

This statement is made not as a threat but as a public and open response to declarations made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] or attributed to him in the press to the effect that it is proposed to delay action on the amendment for a considerable period for the purpose of quickening, if possible, public sentiment throughout the country in opposition to it.

Mr. President, in all fairness, that course ought not to be taken. I have no power and no disposition to impose my views upon any other Senator, but I do desire that all Senators understand that if the President of the United States is to be hampered and impeded in the all-important work which he is just now undertaking, in carrying on negotiations with the representatives of some of the principal foreign governments preliminary to the proposed international economic conference, that fact should be known to the country and the Senate should consider and act upon the amendment in the light of that fact.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Minnesota for so kindly yielding to me.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. For what purpose, may I inquire?

Mr. HASTINGS. I just want to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether it would be a practical matter to temporarily lay aside the farm bill so that we might take up immediately the amendment that has been reported by the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency instead of adding it to the farm bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No. The farm bill cannot be temporarily laid aside, because it is proposed that the amendment shall be considered as an amendment to the farm bill. I have no objection to proceeding to the consideration of the amendment whenever it is offered. If the Senator makes that request when the amendment has been offered, I shall consent to it if other Senators see fit to do that same thing.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understood the purpose or necessity of considering it as a part of the farm bill is the fact that the President desires the discussion to be going on while the international conference is in progress. If that be true, it occurred to me that we might accomplish the purpose by laying aside the farm bill and giving those of us who may be willing to support the farm bill, and who are opposed to the amendment, an opportunity to express ourselves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President. I tried to make it clear in my first statement that that is not the policy which it is expected will be pursued. It is expected that the amendment will be offered whenever the opportunity arises to offer it, and that the Senate may then at its pleasure proceed to the consideration of the so-called "inflation amendment."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Oregon. Let me say, however, that after the Senator has finished I hope this controversy will be carried on at another time and at a later hour.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is unfortunate for myself that I was not on the floor when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] made his statement with respect to the amendment about to be proposed by the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. I expressed yesterday the hope that it might be presented, if at all, as a separate measure. I repeat, it is not fair to the Members of the Senate to be confronted with a situation such as they have in the matter of the proposed legislation.

We have a farm bill with three different sections to it. A few are in favor of all of them. When an inflationary proposal is attached which is wholly separate from the subject attempted to be treated by the farm bill, many will vote in favor of the farm bill who will not vote for and do not favor the proposal to be submitted by the Senator from Florida, the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee.

It is impossible by a single vote, it is impossible by a series of votes, for one to express his views on these unrelated subjects; and in all fairness to orderly legislation and to the Senator himself, who always desires to express his views on particular measures, I submit that this combination presents a situation where it is impossible for a Senator properly and fairly to express himself by a vote. It has been my very strong hope that the unfairness of that situation would be seen by the able Senator from Arkansas.

Now, Mr. President, I am told that the Committee on Banking and Currency have reported to the Senate that this amendment should be proposed as a separate bill. In view of that great committee's judgment and recommendation, why can we not take up and conclude the farm bill, and at a seasonable time take up the other bill if it is reported from the committee favorably as a separate measure?

I make that appeal to the Senator in fairness to every Member of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is always a pleasure to me to respond to any suggestion that the Senator from Oregon may make when I find myself in a position to do so. If he had heard the statement that I made prior to his recent entry into the Chamber—he was necessarily absent—he would have understood that my object in rising at this time is to settle, insofar as I can do so, the doubt that has arisen as to what the procedure will be with respect to the so-called "inflation amendment."

The President feels that it is essential that such action as the Congress may be disposed to take on the subject shall be taken as soon as is practicable. Since the purpose of a filibuster has been announced—not by the Senator from Oregon but by other Senators, including the Senator from Pennsylvania—against the inflation amendment, I do not find it practicable or possible to respond to that spirit by indicating a desire to delay action on the amendment which has just been reported by the Senator from Florida.

We have the same situation with respect to almost every bill that comes in here. Frequently amendments are incorporated that Senators vote against, and they always have the alternative of either supporting the measure or refusing to support it after the amendments are incorporated.

Senators will not only have the opportunity of discussing fairly and fully the proposed amendment having relation to the currency, but, if it be incorporated in the bill, they will still have the opportunity of voting for or against the bill.

Of course, it is true that there are some Senators for the currency amendment who are opposed to the farm bill, and there may be some Senators who are opposed to other provisions of the farm bill who are for the currency amendment; but if we wait until this preliminary conference is over, the amendment will fail of its first, immediate purpose. If we wish to strengthen the hands of the President in the very heroic and difficult task which he is assuming—a task in which, in my judgment, he has the support of 95 percent of the people of the United States without regard to age, race, color, or previous condition of servitude—if we want to give him encouragement and assistance, we should define his authority in time for that definition to be reflected in his negotiations which are commencing this evening.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. For what purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire to clarify the present parliamentary status of the proposed amendment. I ask the Senator to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. For how long?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Half a minute.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday, by unanimous consent, I offered an amendment. Further by unanimous consent it was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee. I understand that the Banking and Currency Committee has submitted a report on that amendment. I now ask if that is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report has been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then, I understand that the amendment and the report accompanying it are now on the Vice President's desk. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's understanding is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. A third inquiry: There is now pending an amendment to what is known as the "farm relief bill"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Will it be in order as soon as that amendment is disposed of for me to propose and offer the amendment as reported by the Banking and Currency Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, it will be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will yield at that point——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No, Mr. President; I refuse to yield any further. Every Senator has the right to take the floor in his own right. I do not intend to occupy the floor for the rest of the day. There will be plenty of opportunity to continue this controversy after I am through.

I rose merely for the purpose of addressing the Senate for a few minutes on the subject which was called to the attention of the Senate first by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and was discussed also by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

It is a subject that is of momentous consequence for this country. I hope I can discuss it temperately; and I shall follow the rule that I have always followed in the Senate, never to discuss any question here in a partisan spirit. This question is of too great importance to be discussed from the standpoint of party politics.

May I suggest to the Senate that the condition in which we find ourselves now comes as a logical consequence of policies and acts that we have committed in the past? The situation in which we find ourselves now was as inevitable as a result of the policies practiced in the last 15 years as that the sun will rise tomorrow morning. Where we are going from here I am sure I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. But we are going.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Where we go will depend upon the policies we inaugurate and pursue from now on.

Now, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that I am absolutely opposed to unbridled inflation as much as I am opposed to unhampered deflation. We hear so much from certain quarters about the dangers of inflation; and they cannot be underestimated. We have had examples in Europe of that. We have had examples of the dire results of unbridled inflation in our own country. As a matter of fact, the credit inflation from 1924 to 1929 destroyed the credit system of the United States; and, as a result of policies we have pursued since, we are on the road to destroy the credit system of the Government itself by an unwise, I might say almost insane, abuse of the credit system of the United States.

During the years 1924 and 1929 I was presumptuous enough to protest on the floor of the Senate against the unbridled inflation of credit and cheapening of the dollar, resulting in higher prices and unbridled speculation. Those who now cry against inflation did not respond at the time. They called it "prosperity."

Senators talk about the inflation of Germany. I venture to say that there were not so many people dispossessed of their property, there were not so many bankruptcies in Germany, as a result of the inflation of its currency, as have resulted here from the inflation of our credit system that ended in the bursting of the bubble in 1929 and the resulting deflation. Both kinds of inflation resulted from and were caused by an unwise administration of credit policies in both countries.

Certainly the condition that we have here today is an inevitable result of the unwise credit policies pursued both by private finance and by the Government during the last 10 or 15 years.

The most important function that a credit system can render to the country is that those who manage it shall so manage it as to prevent a fluctuation in the monetary unit. The dire consequences to industry, to commerce, to property rights, to the income of the Government itself that can come from fluctuation of the purchasing power of the monetary unit should not be necessary to be discussed here now. We know them by bitter experience.

It is well known by the most eminent economists of the world that the most important duty of those who control the credit system is to maintain the stability of the monetary unit; and because we have failed to do that we have had this alternate inflation and deflation, cheap dollar and dear dollar. Going one way, we destroy the property of one class of people, the creditor class. By an unlimited and unhampered deflation we destroy the value of property; we destroy and bankrupt the debtor; and we are rendering no service to the Nation in either direction that we may travel.

It has been said that England did not accomplish anything by going off the gold standard. England did not inflate after leaving the gold standard, but she accomplished this: Through proper management of her currency, managing her monetary unit for the benefit of Great Britain, so far as Great Britain could be benefited, Britain stopped the descending price level in 1931, when she went off the gold standard, and the price level of Great Britain today is about the same as it was in 1931, or possibly 2 percent above. We, through our management of foreign exchange and our currency system, permitted prices to continue to decline. So we are where we are today.

Now we are off the gold standard. We do not know where our currency is at the present time. In the inflation of credit from 1924 to 1929 the unlimited supply of capital issues that were peddled throughout the country piled such an overhead burden of charges and debts that they never could be liquidated, and, of course, our currency would have to go where it is today, and we do not know where it is going now.

The question is, Can we now so manage our currency as to counterdeflate, to stop the deflation, and start on an orderly road back to a revaluation by an orderly and controlled inflation, building a better foundation for our credit system, without going to extremes of inflation, as was done in Germany, or without going to the extreme of the inflation in this country which ended in the explosion of 1929.

I have not had an opportunity to study the provisions of the Thomas amendment. I understand there are other amendments to be offered which are not now before the Senate.

Mr. President, I wanted to take a few minutes to point out that the dangers of deflation are as destructive to property values and to property rights and to human rights as are the extremes of inflation. One is as bad as the other, and unless we can create some agency of control of credit, of management of currency, so as to have some form of stability in order that citizens engaged in industry and trade may know what the value of currency and foreign exchange is going to be, we will be like a boat drifting at sea, going from bad to worse. I hope that can be done. I think it is far more important to the recovery of this country, to the safety of this country, than any other question we can discuss here; but discussion will not solve the problem, unless we act in such a way that we shall inaugurate policies which will lead to recovery, rather than increase the suffering, the uncertainty, the insecurity of the people of this country today.

Mr. President, because of the things which were said here this afternoon, with implications of a recommendation for further deflation, I will say, with all due respect to anyone who does not agree with me, that I think a man in public life, a man who is a citizen of the United States, who upholds the policy of deflation which has been deliberately encouraged since the crash of 1929, is as dangerous to the welfare of the country as is any man who advocates an unbridled inflation, which may make the dollar worth 1 cent. So, when we discuss the things which we are to discuss in the next few days, I hope no one will take umbrage if I suggest that we bear the two extremes in mind. No one desires one or the other. We cannot let this deflation go on, dispossessing millions of people of their property, destroying all values in our institutions, destroying the values back of the life-insurance policies and the savings-bank deposits, destroying the values of all the assets in the banks, making property worthless, bankrupting the farmer and everyone else. Property that is worthless is as worthless as money that is worthless. One is as bad as the other.

There has been a tendency here to uphold one and not the other, and for that reason I dare to impose upon the Senate for just a few minutes to call attention to the dangers involved in both, in order, though possibly it may be too ambitious a hope, that it might lead to a concentrating on the happy medium which I am sure we are all trying to reach.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss at the moment the direct question of currency inflation which has been involved in the debate thus far this afternoon, but it does seem to me highly essential to call attention to the fact that there are two different movements affecting our money resources now organizing themselves under the roof of the Treasury. Unless they are harmonized they represent a futile paradox. Regardless of what happens in respect to inflation upon the one hand, I submit that deflation must stop, upon the other.

One movement deals with currency inflation, and the other movement deals with a liberalization of the banking formula of the country, under which we are to endeavor to repossess the American people of their deposits in the banks of the Nation. It seems to me that we have our emphasis entirely in the wrong place this afternoon if the emphasis is exclusively upon the former movement, and if we cease to realize the utter importance of the latter movement and allow it to lose its essential impulse.

Mr. President, all the emphasis this afternoon has been upon currency in its physical sense. Even in dealing with currency in its physical sense—money, as we understand it—the emphasis has been entirely upon the volume of this physical currency, rather than upon the philosophy of its use. The latter phase defines the actual utility of whatever volume of physical currency either exists or may subsequently be created. That means, as I view it, another misplaced emphasis, because whatever type of currency the Nation shall have it is sterile unless it goes to work and stays at work.

Mr. President, currency at work is bank-credit currency. It becomes the type and token of exchange which is represented by bank checks and kindred evidences of a negotiable credit. It is credit money. It is the major money of the Nation; and it is at present fatefully strangulated.

The importance of this latter type of money, because it is actual money in its essence and in its effect, is at least 15 times as great as the importance of physical currency itself. This is susceptible of easy proof. Therefore I take the liberty of submitting the thought that it will be perfectly futile for us to proceed in respect to physical currency on an inflationary or any other basis unless and until the deflationary policy of the Treasury and Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve district banks in respect to the banking formula of the Nation shall be liberalized. Perhaps, without intending disrespect, I should say this policy should be rationalized.

I take the liberty of submitting the thought that if we concentrate our view upon physical money and cease to realize the desperate fundamental importance of the closed-bank problem and the limited-bank problem in the United States, we have ceased to keep our vigil at the point where it has its first and most fundamental effect upon the lives, the happiness, and the resources of the American people. Indeed we thus should cease our primary attentions to the very existence of countless American communities.

Mr. President, that is not my idea alone, by any manner of fashion. The Associated Press reported upon April 19 that at the request of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate Dr. Warren M. Persons, prominent economist, had submitted a "program for the rehabilitation of our economic system which, among others, envisions a controlled dollar."

I call attention to the fact that I am discussing the opinion of a high economist enlisted by the Finance Committee of the Senate for the purpose of obtaining an authoritative view respecting the precise problem now at the bar of the Senate. Let me continue reading from that Associated Press report:

> As a preliminary to his plan or the adoption of any other plan for stopping continued deflation, Dr. Persons is of the opinion that it may be necessary to "take definite action for preventing runs on banks." In this respect he holds "it may be necessary for the Government and the banks to guarantee temporarily the deposits of those banks which are allowed to open."

Mr. President, I want to subscribe most emphatically in this aspect to Dr. Persons' view. I want to insist again that, no matter what we do with the currency, if we are going to save an opportunity for the great mass of the American people to enjoy their share of whatever recuperation we may have in mind, we have, first of all, to stabilize the banking function; we have, first of all, to open closed banks; we have, first of all, to release the impounded banking resources which belong to the great mass of American depositors; we have, first of all, to make American savings safe for Americans.

Mr. President, I protest that too much emphasis can be put upon currency in its physical sense if that emphasis is at the expense of a realization that we have not yet developed, under the auspices of the Treasury and of the Federal Reserve System, a livable formula for reopening the yet unopened banks of this Nation.

I welcomed another news dispatch as reported by the Associated Press on the same date, namely, April 19, and I quote again:

> In announcing the conference here today—

That is, in Washington—

In announcing the conference here today of the governors of the 12 Federal Reserve banks, Secretary Woodin made it clear that he was looking primarily for means of putting into operation the idle currency now available to the banks, and the freeing of four or five billion dollars locked up in closed institutions.

Mr. President, I submit that when Secretary Woodin was dealing with that phase of this dual problem, on the 19th of April, he was dealing with the first problem that has to be answered. He was belatedly putting first things first. But the Senate is not putting first things first when it deals with currency inflation instead of dealing with the so-called "Glass bill", and whatever adequate provision it may have within it, or which can be put in it, for the insurance of the bank deposits of this Nation. It is folly to tamper with the superstructure until the foundations are renewed in safety.

I confess that the announcement of the Secretary sounded rather ironical in some of our ears, particularly in Michigan ears, in view of the fact that this optimistic word respecting the release of idle currency and the opening of closed banks came upon the very heels of a declination, a refusal, to permit 250 closed banks in the State of Michigan to reopen upon a basis established by action of the State legislature, upon a basis which every man in Michigan believed would create sound institutions which can permanently stand. I speak with respect and with an appreciation of the time which Treasury officials gave me in these long negotiations, and of what ultimately may prove to be a more helpful attitude. But I speak with profound regret that we were not allowed to proceed to swift convalescence.

What is the use of pretending to give a different type of currency—if that is what you are going to do—to the depositor in closed banks up and down the country if he cannot even get at the basic deposit itself which has got to be translated into this new currency? The primary need is to release the deposit and reopen the bank upon a basis which will permit it to stay open, and, equally important, upon a basis which gives the depositor the maximum and immediate use of his deposits.

Those 250 closed banks in a single State represent the very life and livelihood of at least a hundred communities. I hesitate to contemplate what may happen in respect to those communities if all the deposit resources of their people and their local governments shall remain frozen and then subsequently shall be ruthlessly liquidated under the hammer of the auctioneer at the knock-down prices of today.

So it is, Mr. President, I say that I heartily welcome the announcement from the Treasury that not only are they concerned with currency in a physical sense but that they are equally concerned with currency in the sense of bank-credit money, which represents 15 times as important a medium of exchange as actual physical currency itself. The refusal of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board to sanction the so-called "Michigan plan" resulted in a rather bitter statement from the able Governor of my Commonwealth. I quote just one sentence from it:

They have no program and they will not let us put ours into effect.

Mr. President, that is a rather shocking indictment. I submit it not in literal terms but as an indication of the reaction in respect to the orders and the ultimatums that are being handed down under this banking formula at the Capitol. The Governor of Michigan even goes so far as to add that, in his view, he may find it necessary, if the institutions within his purview can have no cooperation whatever from high authority, to request them all to withdraw from the Federal Reserve System.

Some of our statesmen have thought they saw in the present depressionary movement an opportunity to encourage unified banking, an opportunity to drive State banks out of existence, to drive all institutions into a unified system under the national aegis, but I submit that in the light of the experience which some of us are having the tendency is not in that direction. On the contrary, I regret to report, the creation of a feeling that after all the midcontinent cannot trust its banking decisions to national authority at the National Capital, just as it long ago learned that it cannot trust its banking destinies to Wall Street and New York.

Last night's newspapers again indicated—and I am quoting—

A general plan to be used for the possible reopening of closed banks will be considered at an important meeting tonight by representatives of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Reserve System, and the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, there is a field of hope of relief. This whole proposition turns on a state of mind. It turns on an executive attitude; it turns on a policy of the administration. The letter killeth; it is the spirit that giveth life.

The New York Herald Tribune of April 19 in its headline says:

Woodin to offer billions in closed banks.

That is the thing I am praying for, but it takes something more than headlines to do it. We have lived on headlines for 60 sad days. The New York Times of the same date says:

Roosevelt to halt all gold exports.

And I cordially agree that that was essential and advisable. To that extent I follow the President. I emphatically agree that the American dollar should now be left to its own external fate in international exchange. That is a form of inflation which is useful and which I applaud, even though I do not go along with the balance of a program which may too easily produce uncontrolled inflation. But let me continue the headlines—

Plans for liberal reserve credit.

But we have got to do more than planning, Mr. President; we have got to have a reasonably sympathetic administrative attitude in the Federal Reserve and in the district banks and in the Treasury Department respecting the things that Congress is undertaking to do by way of credit expansion in behalf of these institutions. Congress can only provide the tools; Congress cannot force their use.

You can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink. Here is proof that the horse has declined to drink. Here is another Associated Press dispatch of April 19:

Approximately $2,000,000,000 of new currency are available under the recently enacted banking law. The banks have called for only $31,652,000 up to April 15. Only five Federal Reserve districts have used any of this new currency—New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland, and St. Louis.

Mr. President, I respectfully suggest that the wrong verb was used in the dispatch. The dispatch says that the banks had called for only $30,000,000. I know better. I assert that $30,000,000 was all that was issued. The call—or the need to call—was something else. It does no good to call into a deaf ear, and there are none so deaf as those who decline to hear. It is that phase of the problem that challenges my profound concern and it is that phase which makes me welcome this subsequent announcement within the last 24 hours both from the Treasury and from the Federal Reserve headquarters that a new spirit of cooperation and composition is to exist in respect to dealing with these closed banks up and down the Nation. Let us pray that they will not keep the word of promise to the ear and again break it to the hope.

It is not anybody's desire to reopen insolvent banks; but I submit, Mr. President, that we have been proceeding since the first week in March on a philosophy of action which not only demands the summary solvency of institutions at the moment but equally the summary liquidity of institutions at the moment; and I again submit, as I have repeatedly before on the floor of the Senate, that summary liquidity represents a massacre of the depositors and their deposits in this country. Summary liquidation at today's values means that the depositor has ceased to be a depositor in these days of good promise. Under such auspices the depositor is cleaned out when there is a subsequent chance to share in the recuperation of values that are contemplated under the balance of the "new deal." I want to keep him and his deposit and his bank alive for the resurrection.

Currency in its physical sense is important, and that is the particular thing to which the Senate is now almost exclusively addressing itself. But credit money, meaning the normal functioning of normal banks, is infinitely more important. Indeed, I repeat, it is at least 15 times as important. In some instances it is a hundred times more important.

Talk about contraction in our physical currency. What about the contraction in our bank-credit currency? Talk about inflated currency. How about deflated banks? Listen to this:

In 1929 the total clearings of the clearing houses of the United States for the year were $713,000,000,000. Compare that with the supply of currency: $713,000,000,000 of credit money exchanged hands in a year when there was not over $6,000,000,000 of actual physical currency in existence. That indicates something of the relative importance of the two propositions. But that is not all. Let us see what happened to this bank-credit currency in 1931. It had gone down from $713,000,000,000 of clearing-house exchanges to $463,000,000,000. It was nearly cut in two. It went down still more in 1932. The figures are utterly eloquent. They move me to lay before the Senate my plea that no matter how much emphasis we may put upon physical currency it is important in this equation that fundamentally and primarily the first emphasis belongs upon bank-credit currency and the normal functioning of banks. Otherwise we are off on a reckless detour.

We cannot have this normal banking function without confidence in banks, and we cannot have adequate confidence in banks recaptured, Mr. President, in the face of the experience which the depositors of the United States have suffered in the last few months; we cannot recapture that confidence until we put the warrant of the Federal Government, on a legitimate and self-liquidating basis, behind the deposits in the acknowledged banks of the United States.

I am not talking about a guaranty which is a drain upon the Treasury. I am talking, as I always have, about an insurance which is self-sustained and self-supported and which will say to the depositors of this Nation, "You are just as safe in the regular banking structure of the land as you are in the Postal Savings bank." Until they are thus safe, Mr. President, we shall not renew the normal banking functions, and until we do renew the normal banking functions and renew the normal flow of bank-check credits and the normal flow of bank-credit money, everything else that we do will be secondary and relatively impotent. We want all our solvent banks open. We want all of them sure to stay open. We want a rule of reason in respect to solvency; and then we want a warrant which entitles the depositor to that complete and absolute confidence which is prerequisite either to a happy people or to social and economic justice.

Therefore, I am saying in conclusion, that whatever emphasis belongs upon the question of physical currency, there is a primary emphasis which has not yet been appropriately put upon this other medium of exchange and the institutions upon which it depends. I say again that the conferences down yonder in the Treasury and in the Federal Reserve System, which are dealing with physical currency, are secondary in their final advantage to the American people, secondary to those other conferences which are undertaking to liberalize the viewpoint and the attitude of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve System toward the closed banks and the impounded bank deposits of the American people.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield the floor; I am through.

Mr. LONG. I want to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. LONG. From what I have heard of the Senator's address I am led to believe that he entertains more or less the same view that I have expressed here on the floor that we need a more liberal Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cordially agree with the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought the Senator wanted to get action on his amendment. That is what I desire to do.

Mr. LONG. Let us vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator desires to speak, I withhold my suggestion.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Just for a moment apropos of the remark that was made about the need of a more liberal Federal Reserve Board. I would amend that by taking out the word "liberal" and inserting the word "intelligent."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, regarding the amendment, I wish to submit very briefly some views about it, views which are concurred in, I may say, by the Farm Loan Bureau. This is the position they take about it.

The Senate has under consideration an amendment to section 29 (a) of the amendment proposed by Senator WAGNER to bill H.R. 3835 with reference to agricultural credits. In this connection attention is called to an amendment to section 29 (a) which was adopted by the Committee on Agriculture of the House when the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 was being considered. This amendment read as follows:

> Such loans shall be made upon application therefor by such banks and upon compliance with the requirements of this section. Such loans shall be made to aid the orderly liquidation of any such bank in accordance with such plan as may be approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner. Before any such plan is approved by the Commissioner he shall be satisfied that the plan carries out the purposes of this section and that such part of the proceeds of the loan as is devoted to settlements with bondholders will be used only to effect an equitable settlement with all bondholders. After the plan has been approved by the Commissioner he shall require the bank to mail a copy thereof to all its known bondholders and to publish a notice setting forth its provisions in at least three newspapers having general circulation.

It is believed that this amendment will tend to safeguard the making of loans by the Farm Loan Commissioner to joint-stock land banks and should be adopted. If the language above referred to is added as an amendment, it should be inserted after the words "the requirements of this section", on page 12, line 7, of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

In a moment I shall offer that amendment, and I think there will be no objection to it. It facilitates the clearing up of the whole matter. It was thoroughly considered in the House and is not inconsistent with other provisions in the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I shall offer the amendment after we dispose of the pending amendment.

An amendment to the same section has been proposed by Senator SHIPSTEAD. This amendment provides in part that before any loan to a joint-stock land bank is made by the Farm Loan Commissioner—

(1) That such bank will pay, in purchasing its own outstanding farm-loan bonds paid for out of the proceeds of the loan, an amount not to exceed 110 percent of the amount which such holders may have paid for their bonds prior to April 17, 1933, but in no event to exceed the face value of such bonds, together with the accrued and unpaid interest thereon; and (2) that whenever any such bonds are so purchased by such bank at a price less than the amount of the face value of such bonds, together with accrued and unpaid interest thereon, the difference between such face value and interest and the amount paid for such bonds by the bank shall be credited pro rata to the borrowers from such bank in reduction on their loans outstanding at the time of such purchase.

The purpose of the first condition is obviously intended to prevent speculators from making a profit on the joint-stock land bank bonds which they may have purchased prior to the adoption of the proposed legislation. It will be exceedingly difficult to ascertain the exact amount paid for these bonds. However, if it is desired to adopt an amendment of this character, it would be preferable to provide that the holders of the bonds of any bank should not receive more than 110 percent of the average bid price of the bonds of such bank over a period of 6 months prior to March 1, 1933.

With reference to the second condition which would require the banks to pass on to their farmer borrowers any paper profit that might be realized from the purchase and retirement of their bonds, it seems clear that if this provision is adopted, it will defeat the whole purpose of the section. The provisions with respect to making loans to joint-stock land banks were incorporated in the proposed bill for the purpose of aiding in their orderly liquidation. The proposal contemplates that the joint-stock land banks will purchase and retire half of their outstanding bonds. After the retirement of bonds in the case of many of the banks their statements would show that the transaction had resulted in a substantial profit. As a matter of fact, however, this apparent or paper profit may never be available to the banks. In many instances it may be entirely wiped out by the losses which will be sustained during the period of liquidation. It will not be possible, therefore, to determine the exact amount of profit, if any, that the banks may make until they have been finally liquidated. If the banks are required to give their respective borrowers the benefit of the apparent profit which would be shown in their statements following the retirement of their bonds, none of the banks would be able to accept loans from the Farm Loan Commissioner.

The question of the disposition to be made of joint-stock land banks is an important one, and it is felt that no plan for refinancing farm-mortgage indebtedness would be complete unless provision is made for the orderly liquidation of these institutions. As the matter now stands, it is an important link in the whole scheme of refinancing. The proposal has received the approval of the administration, the banks, and the farm organizations. If it is made inoperative through the adoption of the proposed amendment, it is inevitable that a great percentage of the joint-stock land banks will be forced into receivership.

The total resources of the joint-stock land banks amount to approximately $430,000,000. If these institutions are forced into receivership, it will undoubtedly have a very deleterious effect upon the whole farm-mortgage situation. Receiverships will work hardships upon the borrowers, cause greater losses to the security holders, and would unquestionably have a bad effect upon the market for the new bonds which are to be issued under the other provisions of the same bill. In short, the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota would make the plan absolutely unworkable.

That is the principal objection to the amendment. The plan has been agreed upon by the Federal land-bank people, the joint-stock land bank people, the Farm Loan Board, and the farm-loan associations, or practically all of them, so far as I know. To modify that plan, according to the Senator's amendment, would practically destroy the workability of the plan and defeat its purpose. Therefore, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota will be defeated.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not sure that I understood one of the statements made by the Senator. He said the amendment would prevent the making of any profits in the retirement of the bonds. He also said the amendment would destroy the purpose of the bill. The Senator did not mean to leave the impression that the purpose of the bill is to make a profit, did he?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. The purpose of the bill is to effect a liquidation of the banks, and the Senator's amendment would not do it. It would throw them into receivership. Orderly liquidation is one thing and receivership is another thing. Receivership would result in inevitable loss, whereas they believe if they can get the accommodation under the plan they have suggested, many of the banks will be able to go on and finally work themselves out. Whatever benefit they can get in the operation of the plan by settlement with the bondholders inures to the Farm Bureau. The plan is possible from every standpoint.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CAREY. Is it not true that the only way in which these banks can be liquidated, and the only way in which the borrower can be taken care of, is by permitting the banks to purchase a part of their bonds at a discount?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is true; and the benefit to the banks in that way proceeds to the farmer.

Mr. CAREY. It goes on to the farmer, and an amendment such as the Senator from Minnesota proposes will make impossible the liquidation of the joint-stock bank, and, by making that impossible, will make it impossible to help the borrowers from that bank.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. CAREY. It will force the bank into a receivership, and the borrower will be forced to pay the full amount of his mortgage, if it is possible to collect it, and also to pay a high rate of interest.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is true. He will have to pay it, or else he will be foreclosed and lose everything.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not for a moment question the sincerity of the Senator; but I confess that I cannot understand why the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, if enacted, would have the effect which the Senator says it will have.

The object of the amendment is to pass on to the borrower any benefit that may come. The Senator says that is going to happen without the amendment. That is disputed, as I understand, by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FLETCHER. This amendment requires that the exact amount paid for these bonds shall be ascertained in each case. The idea was, of course, that the people who own bonds, thinking the Government is going to loan money on them or otherwise take them up, will put up their price right away, and that the bonds could not be gotten in that way. The price is to be determined not by an average over a period of 6 months. The limit in this amendment is that the holder shall receive not more than 110 percent of the average bid price of the bonds at the time, whereas it ought to be, if adopted at all, the average bid price over a period of 6 months.

Mr. NORRIS. The object is, as I understand, to give to the man who has invested his money in these bonds 10 percent profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. How will it be ascertained what a man paid for his bonds?

Mr. NORRIS. He would have to show that. It seems to me that would not be difficult to ascertain. He would have to show what he paid in order to get anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. I doubt very much if the holders of these bonds will be found willing to give that information.

Mr. NORRIS. Then they could not sell their bonds.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no way of getting at it.

Mr. NORRIS. They cannot get anything if they do not show that.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. There is another point in connection with these bonds. Assuming that the bank offered to buy certain bonds, say, at 70, and some other bondholder objected to the bank paying that price, he has an equal share in the assets of the bank. Each bondholder has the same share; and the bondholder could object to anything of this kind.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Florida will permit me, I do not understand how one bondholder could prevent some other bondholder from selling his bonds at any price he wanted to.

Mr. CAREY. Under this arrangement, they can pay 10 points more for the bonds than the man purchased them for.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CAREY. Assuming that one man paid 40 for his bonds, and another man paid 50, could not the man who had paid 40 object to the bank paying the other bondholder 50?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand how he could.

Mr. CAREY. I think he would have a right to demand as much for his bond as the other bondholder.

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, he does not need to sell his bond at any price if he does not want to; and I do not understand how one bondholder could object to another bondholder's getting more or getting less.

Mr. CAREY. The assets of the bank are being paid out at higher prices than they will pay him for his bond.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; probably they would not pay every man the same. They would not pay, however, more than 10 percent in advance of what the bond cost him. The original holder of the bond is out, as I understand. He has sold his bond. He probably paid 100, or nearly that, for his bond; but he sold it to somebody else. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, as I understand, provides that in purchasing bonds that man could not be paid more than 10 percent in advance of what he paid.

Suppose he does not want to take it. He does not need to. He does not need to sell at par if he does not want to. He can take his chances on whatever may happen. I take it, however, knowing that these banks are going to be liquidated, that he would jump at the opportunity of getting a profit of 10 percent.

Mr. CAREY. Unless he desired to hold the bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. He would not hold these bonds as an investment, because the banks are going to be liquidated. They are going out of business.

Mr. CAREY. He would have this advantage: If a part of the bondholders should sell their bonds, say, for 50 percent of what they were worth, it would raise the value of the balance of the bonds to somebody else by reducing the liabilities of the banks that much. If the bank could borrow $50,000, and with that sum retire $100,000 of bonds, the rest of the bonds would be worth more money.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire to restate some of the things I said about this amendment last night, because so many Senators were not here at that time.

The purpose of this part of the bill is to make possible the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks. For the purpose of accomplishing that object we furnish $100,000,000 of Government money; and in furnishing that money I believe we have a right to, and I think we should, put such restrictions upon the expenditure of the money that, so far as we can bring it about, justice shall be done to the bondholder, to the stockholder of the joint-stock land bank, and to the borrower.

There are three parties here whose welfare and property rights will be affected by the use of this money. If this were an entirely private corporation—as, of course, it is—using its own money, I would not suggest any interference with its own process of liquidation. But because in this case its orderly liquidation is made possible only through the use of public money, I believe we should put such restrictions upon the process of liquidation as to see that justice is done to all three parties concerned.

What is it to liquidate any business? It is to dispose of its assets for what can be obtained for them, and to pay the liabilities.

What are the liabilities of the joint-stock banks?

They have about $430,000,000 in bonds outstanding that were sold to investors. That is the amount of their liabilities—$430,000,000. Their assets are composed of $460,000,000 of farm mortgages held against liabilities. What are the bonds worth upon the market? Some time ago, when I made inquiry from a reliable source, I discovered that the average value of the bonds on the market was less than 40 cents on the dollar. I was told that the market price had gone up about $10 on an average within a very short time.

If with this money, $100,000,000, furnished by Congress, the joint-stock land banks can go out and buy the bonds, their own liabilities, at a great discount—for instance, 40 cents on the dollar—they can buy, for $100,000,000, $250,000,000 of their liabilities and liquidate them for $100,000,000.

There is a difference here between what they owe and the price for which they can purchase back their bonds of $150,000,000. If they retire $250,000,000 of the liabilities with $100,000,000, that leaves the difference between $430,000,000 and $250,000,000 as outstanding liabilities. That leaves a liability of $180,000,000. Against this $180,000,000 they have $460,000,000 in the form of assets, leaving $280,000,000 in assets with which to liquidate $180,000,000 of liabilities.

I understand that 50 percent of these $460,000,000 of mortgages are not in default; and 50 percent of $460,000,000 makes $230,000,000 of assets that are not in default.

We protect the bondholder in this respect: We give him back his money. There was merit in what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said last night, that it was not fair to give a man who had held a bond for 10 years, possibly without drawing any interest, proportionately as much—that is, to give him his money invested, plus 10 percent—as it would be given the money invested, plus 10 percent, to a man who had held his bond only for 2 weeks. There is merit in that; and I am perfectly willing to pay 10 percent on top of what he has paid for his bond, plus a reasonable amount of interest during the time he has held the bond, less whatever dividends he has received.

We protect the bondholder in that respect; and I think he ought to be protected, because unless we protect him and turn over to the joint-stock land banks $100,000,000, they will have a monopoly in the purchase of these bonds, and they can freeze out the bondholders unless they are put in the hands of a receiver. They can bid so low that he cannot get his money back. Of course, he has the alternative of asking for a receivership.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CAREY. Why does the Senator say that the land banks will have a monopoly? People will buy the bonds as they are buying them now. They will have the same backing, the same security back of them. They will be sold in the market as well as to the banks, I think.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I anticipate that people will not buy liabilities from an institution that is going to be liquidated, because, if it is to be liquidated, all of its bonds will have to go on the market.

Mr. CAREY. If the banks are purchasing a certain proportion of these bonds at a discount, would there not be reason for people holding them and speculating in them?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have an idea that with this amendment there would not be any reason for speculating in those bonds. I do not think a speculative profit should be made out of a transaction to which the Government furnishes the money for the purpose of liquidation.

Mr. CAREY. But there are other people involved. The man who bought the bond may have paid a hundred dollars for it. He should be able to hold the bond and get $100.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under this amendment he could get his $100.

Mr. CAREY. If the bank should pay it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under this amendment it is provided they shall pay 110 percent of the purchase price, except that they must not pay above par.

Mr. CAREY. Suppose they had to pay 110 percent. They might not have the money to pay that much for them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That limitation is applied to the $100 that is loaned.

Mr. CAREY. They can buy that amount of bonds?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; at the present value.

Mr. CAREY. That would not help the bank to liquidate. They might just as well have their bonds out at par as to pay 110 to retire them. The bank would not be any nearer liquidation than before they borrowed the money.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They would save $150,000,000 at the average market price of today. They would retire $250,000,000 of bonds with $100,000,000 investment.

Mr. CAREY. I think the Senator overlooks the fact that the bonds of the different banks have very different values.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I know that.

Mr. CAREY. I do not think we can take the average value of the bonds. Some of the banks are in fair shape and some are almost insolvent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is true. They will all become insolvent unless they get this $100,000,000, in my opinion.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I understand the purpose of the amendment, it is that a purchaser of a bond may receive back his bond, with 10 percent additional.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If that is true, why, then, interfere with the legitimate investor at an honest price getting back his hundred dollars, if it costs him that? As I understand what the Senator proposes, he is willing to give a hundred dollars to the man who paid the hundred dollars, but he does not propose to set up a speculating scheme whereby he can buy a bond at $10 and go out and get a hundred for it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is correct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. And carry on that speculative operation with Government funds?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is that the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is one purpose which I hope to accomplish. The banks buying $250,000,000 of bonds for $100,000,000 save $150,000,000. They reduce their liabilities by that much. They have that much less to pay. A bank and the stockholders lose nothing if through this process of borrowing money from the Government they are able to retire their liabilities, and whatever profits they make in the purchase of their own liabilities they pass on to the benefit of the borrower.

If one buys a thousand dollar bond for $400, and against that as an asset has a mortgage of a thousand dollars, in a private business transaction, and can buy his own note back for $400, a note floated against the mortgage for a thousand dollars, and can collect that thousand dollars on the mortgage, he makes the difference between what he paid for the note and what he was able to collect on the mortgage. That is a private business transaction, and we would not interfere with that. But this is public business with public funds in order not to undo the work that was done when we created the joint-stock land bank system, to make it possible to give them a chance to liquidate in an orderly manner, to give as much of what is left to the bondholders, to protect the stockholder, and to give the benefits, whatever benefits may accrue, to the borrower, I think we have the right to put these restrictions on the use of this money.

Are we going to lend money to a private institution to retire its liabilities for 40 cents on the dollar, and then permit it to collect the mortgages in full, so far as they can, when they have 50 percent of the mortgages not in default? It seems to me that if we want to help the farmers and the bondholders, and also protect the stockholder, we have a chance to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it a fair statement to say that the Senator from Minnesota is trying, in his amendment, to give the benefit to the borrower, the mortgagor, of all savings made by the use of this public money?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is this true, that either the stockholder of the joint-stock land bank, or the farmer, one or the other, is going to get the benefit of the public funds, the hundred million dollars appropriated in this bill?

If the Senator's amendment were not agreed to, would it be accurate to say that this benefit would go to the stockholder rather than to the mortgagor?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If this amendment is not agreed to, there are two possible beneficiaries. Either the bondholder may make it impossible to purchase the bonds for less than par, by holding them off the market, and compel the joint-stock land bank to keep bidding for the bonds in order to carry out the purpose of the bill; if that is the case, many of the people who have bought these bonds for very low percentage on their face value would have an immense profit. The joint-stock land banks, in my opinion, are the only ones who would buy the bonds, because, it seems to me, no one would come out and buy bonds from an institution which the Government by law had said it was going to liquidate.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's amendment is agreed to, would it not follow that speculators would at once buy these bonds, on the theory that they were going to get a hundred cents on the dollar out of this public money?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There is that possibility. On the other hand, there is also this possibility, that the stockholders of the joint-stock land banks, in order to make money on the transaction, would want to buy the bonds as cheaply as they could, because they were retiring their liabilities. Many people in business would like to buy their bonds or their notes back for 30 or 40 cents on the dollar. They would have to pay that much less. But they want to collect what they have coming from the other fellow in full, or as nearly in full as possible.

If the joint-stock land banks can save a hundred or two hundred million dollars on their bonds by the use of this Government money, they do not lose a dollar of money invested for the bondholder; he gets his money back. If to the borrower the remainder is prorated as credit on his mortgage, I fail to see how there can be any injury to anyone, but it would be of benefit to three parties—to the borrower, who gets the benefit of total savings; to the stockholder, who gets his bank liquidated; and to the bondholder, who receives the money back that he gets on the bonds.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the amendment provides—that whenever any such bonds are so purchased by such bank at a price less than the amount of the face value of such bonds, together with accrued and unpaid interest thereon, the difference between such face value and interest and the amount paid for such bonds by the bank shall be credited.

It is impossible for them to ascertain what the profit is. They may have made a profit. The end is not yet. They have simply started. They may not, in the final analysis, realize even as much as they paid, but the Senator would force them by this amendment immediately to give credit to the borrower. A bank would not be willing to borrow under such circumstances. I do not think the banks would apply to the Farm Loan Commissioner for loans if they had at once to give credit to the borrower for the difference between the full face value and interest on the mortgage and what they paid for it. I think the Senator would destroy the workability of the plan. They could not make the settlement.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It seems to me that if the banks want to liquidate their liabilities, they would be glad of an opportunity to do so. When they retire a bond, whatever they paid for it they have reduced that much of the liability, and they have received credit. The minute they buy that bond, at whatever price they pay below par, they receive credit. If they paid $30—30 cents on the dollar—then already they have a credit of $100 and they have made $70. Why not at the same time extend that credit to the borrower, as something already received?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I think that in this discussion the Senator from Minnesota overlooks one thing; that is, the fact that we are only lending under this proposed law to the joint-stock land banks $150,000,000, while the total amount of their mortgages or bonds is some $400,000,000.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Four hundred and sixty million dollars.

Mr. CAREY. So that they have under this bill a very small proportion of their bonds or their liabilities on which to work. The proposed law provides that there will be a reduction in interest on all loans to 5 percent. That means that the joint-stock land banks will have to make up for the difference in interest on the proportion of their loans that are not sold to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under this proposed law. So they have to have some extra money to take care of that. They also agree that they will not foreclose on loans during a period of 2 years. That means that for a period of 2 years the banks have to pay interest on their outstanding bonds, while they may not be collecting interest from the borrowers. Therefore, I think, to say that the bank is not doing anything for the borrower is hardly fair, because the bank is giving something in return for the money it is borrowing, and, further, it is borrowing but a small percentage on the basis of loans outstanding.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the difference is not paid by the banks; it is paid by the Government. The Government provides an appropriation of $15,000,000 to take up the slack or the difference in the interest. It is paid by the Government.

Mr. CAREY. That is only in case of the bonds which the Government is issuing for the benefit of the Federal land banks. It does not apply, as I understand, to the loans made by the joint-stock land banks.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The farm-loan banks.

Mr. CAREY. The farm-loan banks, but not the joint-stock land banks.

Mr. TRAMMELL. They are so knit together that it is difficult to make the distinction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted some remarks on this amendment and took the position that the effect of the amendment would be to involve practically all the joint-stock land banks in receivership. A further investigation of the subject confirms me in that conclusion. The object of this amendment is in conflict, as stated by the Senator from Florida and by the Senator from Wyoming, with the primary purposes of the bill as worked out after a prolonged study of the subject by the Farm Loan Bureau and the Banking and Currency Committee, in that it will render inoperative title II insofar as it provides for loans to joint-stock land banks to bring about orderly liquidation.

The chief purpose of the bill is relief to the farmer; first, by raising the price of the crops he produces; second, by scaling down and easing his mortgage indebtedness; and, third, by extensions. The mortgage section of this bill as set out in the Wagner amendment is the result of months of consideration and study. The object is to scale down loans so far as possible, reduce interest rates, and prevent foreclosures during the period of adjustment of farm mortgage prices.

The joint-stock land bank problem was considered on the basis of the necessity of liquidating these banks in a manner that would do the least harm to the farmer and prevent the continuation of the drastic liquidation of these banks during the past few years, which resulted in numerous foreclosures and widespread taking over of farms by these banks.

The loans of the joint-stock land banks approximate $450,000,000. Receivership of these banks would involve the throwing on the market of nearly half a billion of joint-stock land bank assets, cause untold chaos, and demoralize present farm values. They are bad enough now. After long and detailed consideration of the problem title II of the pending bill was agreed to by the Banking and Currency Committee and by the Farm Loan Commissioner as the most advisable manner of liquidating these banks in such a way that the farmer will receive, first, a reduction in the rate of interest on his loan; second, a scaling down of his farm mortgage in the discounting of the loans of the joint-stock land bank to the Federal land banks; and third, the prevention of foreclosures during the period of liquidation.

It has been said here that the loaning of money under this section to the joint-stock land banks would enable them to retire all their bonds at 40 cents on the dollar, thus netting them a profit of the balance. There is not the remotest possibility of the situation working out in that manner. It is true that the bonds of these banks have a nominal quotation of from 30 to 75 cents on the dollar, depending on the strength of the particular bank, but to buy a considerable quantity of the bonds of any bank whose bonds are quoted at such figures would probably result in an increase in the quoted price. The quoted price of the joint-stock land bank bonds does not in any sense reflect the price at which any substantial amount of them can actually be purchased. At the present time there is no strong demand for these bonds. Hence they are offered at a greatly deflated price.

The purchase of any material part of the bonds of any bank would have to be at a higher figure than the nominal quotations now made or the bondholder would not accept the offer.

It is not proposed in title II that the funds to be loaned under this section will in any case be sufficient to retire the greater part of the bonds. The Farm Loan Commissioner will loan to such joint-stock land banks as can furnish proper collateral to secure the loan an amount agreed to by the Commissioner. With that amount the bank will make a public offer to the bondholders of the bank for retirement of part but not all the bonds of the bank held by each bondholder.

As a practical example of how this legislation will work, take a bank with $10,000,000 of 6-percent mortgages and $10,000,000 of 5-percent bonds. Under title II this bank would be entitled to borrow about $2,500,000 from the Farm Loan Commissioner, subject to his approval and subject to being able to furnish satisfactory collateral. An offer would then be publicly made to all bondholders of that bank to pay them approximately 50 cents on the dollar for half of their bonds. If the bondholders accept, a total of $5,000,000 of the $10,000,000 of bonds will be purchased with the $2,500,000, and the bank would then have $5,000,000 of bonds outstanding at 5 percent interest rate and would owe $2,500,000 to the Farm Loan Commissioner, although on the $10,000,000 of mortgages still owned by the bank the interest rate would be reduced to 5 percent for the life of the loan, whether 20 years or 30 years.

When, Mr. President, you take into consideration that the reduction is 1 percent per annum you can readily see that there is no possibility of these banks remaining out of receivership when there is no excess possible to be earned above the amount required in the liquidation of their own obligations.

The object of this bill is to aid the farmer by scaling down both his interest and his mortgage, and by granting him extensions. If the loans are to be subject to the conditions of this amendment they will not be made at all, and the banks will pass into receivership, throwing immediately on the market $500,000,000 worth of joint-stock land bank assets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. It seems to me that either the Senator is incorrect, with reference to his amendment, or that he has made a mistake in the mechanics of the amendment. The amendment of the Senator, for instance, provides—

Before any joint-stock land bank shall receive a loan as provided for in this section such bank shall enter into an agreement with the Farm Loan Commissioner (1) that such bank will pay, in purchasing its own outstanding farm-loan bonds paid for out of the proceeds of the loan, an amount not to exceed 110 percent of the amount which such holders may have paid for their bonds prior to April 17, 1933.

Under the Senator's amendment one man might have bought bonds 4 years ago or 5 years ago and he could sell his bonds for 110 percent of the amount that he paid for them, and the same thing would be true of a man who had bought his bonds a week ago. It seems to me that the Senator should rectify that condition in his amendment. I would suggest, if he thinks that is correct, that he strike out the words "110 percent" and add after the figures "1933" language such as this: "together with 6 percent interest per annum since the date of purchase."

Such an amendment would fit all instances of purchases, either 6 percent or 4 percent or 8 percent or whatever the Senator wants to place it at; but it is certainly a legitimate objection to his amendment in its present form that a man who had held a bond for a week would get 10 percent profit and a man who had held a bond for 4 years would get 10 percent profit.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, there is merit in what the Senator says, and I called attention earlier in my remarks to the objection on that point made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] also mentioned it to me. As a result, I have here a proposed modification which I will read and ask the Senator if it meets his approval. I have prepared an amendment that limits the payment of principal to 100 percent of the amount which such holders may have paid for their bonds prior to April 17, 1933, "plus interest on such amount at the rate of 5 percent per annum from the date of the purchase of such bonds by such holders, less the amount of any interest received by them on such bonds."

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator already offered an amendment of that kind?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have not offered it. I have prepared it and am ready to offer it, and will offer it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, as modified, will be read by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 13, between lines 18 and 19, it is proposed to insert:

(c) Before any joint-stock land bank shall receive a loan as provided for in this section such bank shall enter into an agreement with the Farm Loan Commissioner (1) that such bank will pay, in purchasing its own outstanding farm-loan bonds paid for out of the proceeds of the loan, an amount not to exceed 110 percent of the amount which such holders may have paid for their bonds prior to April 17, 1933, plus 10 percent and plus interest on such amount at the rate of 5 percent per annum from the date of the purchase of such bonds by such holders, less the amount of any interest received by them on such bonds, but in no event to exceed the face value of such bonds, together with the accrued and unpaid interest thereon; and (2) that whenever any such bonds are so purchased by such bank at a price less than the amount of the face value of such bonds, together with accrued and unpaid interest thereon, the difference between such face value and interest and the amount paid for such bonds by the bank shall be credited pro rata to the borrowers from such bank in reduction on their loans outstanding at the time of such purchase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. There is still a conflict in the Senator's amendment, I think, because the words "110 percent" are in the amendment as read.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The clerk failed to note that 110 percent has been changed to 100 percent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, as modified.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I understand the amendment provides that the holder of a bond shall receive 5 percent per annum from the time that he has purchased the bond. Is that correct?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Less the amount of any interest received.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator refer to the amendment, as modified, or to the original amendment?

Mr. CAREY. I wish to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the original amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can we not act on the modification to the amendment first?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. Has not the Senator from Minnesota authority to modify his own amendment without asking the consent of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of that opinion, and the Chair had stated that the question was on the amendment, as modified.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well.

Mr. CAREY. I offer and ask the clerk to read an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment in the nature of a substitute will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, line 22, after the word "section", it is proposed to insert:

Such loans shall be made to aid the orderly liquidation of any such bank in accordance with such plan as may be approved by the farm-loan commissioner. Before any such plan is approved by the commissioner he shall be satisfied that the plan carries out the purposes of this section and that such part of the proceeds of the loan as is devoted to settlements with bondholders will be used only to effect an equitable settlement with all bondholders. After the plan has been approved by the commissioner he shall require the bank to mail a copy thereof to all its known bondholders and to publish a notice setting forth its provisions in at least three newspapers having general circulation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, on what page and line does the amendment come in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed the amendment comes in on page 12, line 22, after the word "section."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I wonder what print of the bill is referred to. In the original print, as used by the clerk, there does not seem to be any such word at the point indicated.

Mr. CAREY. I think the amendment should come in on page 13, between lines 18 and 19.

Mr. President, I am not going to take any time discussing this amendment. The Senator from Florida stated that this amendment had been prepared by the farm-loan commissioner as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. I think the amendment is plain. It provides that the liquidation of these banks shall be controlled by the Farm Loan Commissioner; that he shall have supervision, and that any plan of liquidation shall be approved by him. It also provides for equitable treatment of the bondholders of the banks. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Keyes	Reynolds
Ashurst	Couzens	King	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	Lewis	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	Logan	Schall

Carey	Hayden	Overton	Walcott
Clark	Hebert	Patterson	Walsh
Connally	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Kean	Pope	White
Copeland	Kendrick	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming is an amendment in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in that view of the matter, since the Chair sustains the point of order, those who are in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming, if they wish to vote for it, would vote "nay" on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota and thus have an opportunity to vote "yea" if the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming is subsequently offered. I think the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming is all right. I think it is fair. I do not believe the Shipstead amendment should be agreed to, as I have already stated.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment now, and will offer it after the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is disposed of.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on my amendment I should like to call this point to the attention of the Senate. The principle involved in the amendment now pending tries to carry out the same principle for borrowers of the joint-stock land banks as has already been accorded borrowers of the Federal land banks In principle it is the same, but it is not the same in words. Here is what was incorporated in the bill for the benefit of the borrowers from the Federal land banks:

> Any borrower who obtains a loan from a Federal land bank after the date of this paragraph takes effect may, at any time after the expiration of 5 years from the date such loan was made, tender to such bank on any regular installment date bonds issued under this paragraph in an amount not to exceed the unpaid principal of his loan, and the bonds so tendered shall be accepted by the bank at par in payment of any part of such unpaid principal.

The principle involved in the section just read does not vary except in wording from the amendment now pending. A borrower from the Federal land bank can go out and, if he can buy the bonds on the market at 40 cents on the dollar, can take those bonds and present them to the Federal land bank and those bonds will pay their face value upon the debt represented by his mortgage. My amendment provides that the money which is furnished by the Federal Government for purchasing the outstanding liabilities of the joint-stock land banks below par—that is, the amount at which they are purchased below par—shall go to the benefit of the borrowers from the bank. We are giving to the borrowers of the joint-stock land banks the same privilege we have already given to the borrowers of the Federal land banks. That is all the amendment means.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the statement just made by the Senator from Minnesota is somewhat misleading. The new bonds which are to be permitted to be used in settlement of debts due the bank have their interest guaranteed by the Government. They are based upon a substantial scale down. That is an entirely different proposition from taking bonds that are worth 30 or 40 cents and denying the bank the right to purchase its own bonds, as it is now required to do by law, and giving the proceeds to the alleged borrower. The bank would have no object in making a loan if it could get no benefit from it. The loans would not be made. The effect of the Shipstead amendment would be to prevent any loans under this provision of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] The amendment is rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had announced its decision on the vote just taken and the request for a division comes too late.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand that during my absence from the Chamber the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] called attention to some newspaper articles printed this morning which seemed to imply that I had stated an intention to filibuster against the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. I want to assure the Senator and his colleagues that no such statement was authorized by me and no such ridiculous intention was ever entertained by me. I have no idea of filibustering against the amendment, but I do know that some of my colleagues and I intend to speak our minds plainly about it in the hope that the country will come to realize what is in the amendment; and in the further hope that, realizing it, the country will make its feelings so well known that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. President, I should like to say further that many inquiries have come in as to the amount of inflation that might be possible under the amendment. I think it is very easy to compute.

In the first place an inflation of $3,000,000,000 may be authorized—it is not compelled, but it is authorized—under the first section of the bill. A further and additional inflation of $3,000,000,000 may be resorted to by the use of printing-press money authorized by the second section of the bill. A third type of inflation over and above that $6,000,000,000 which I have mentioned may be resorted to by the use of the authority which it would give to the President to diminish the gold content of the dollar.

If the present outstanding circulation of the United States—which, at this moment, is about $6,000,000,000—were treated to that process, obviously its amount would be doubled. There we have an additional six billions of currency which would be issued by the exercise of that presidential power.

I have reached a total of 12 billions of additional currency.

In addition to all of that, our present gold reserves, with the present standard of gold content in the dollar, are sufficient as the law now stands to justify an additional currency issue of sound money of about $4,000,000,000; and that in itself would be doubled by the use of this power of the President to diminish the gold content.

That is to say, if all of the power given by this bill were exercised, we would have an addition of 3 billions through purchases by the Federal Reserve banks of Government securities; an addition of another 3 billions through the issuance of printing-press money to retire outstanding Government bonds; an addition of 6 billions through the inflation of the present outstanding currency; and an addition of 8 billions through a use of our surplus gold stocks based on this new diminished gold-reserve requirement.

Three plus three plus six plus eight makes twenty billions of dollars. That is the maximum inflation, as I compute it, authorized by this bill. I disregard as comparatively unimportant the silver section with which the bill concludes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. LONG. How does the Senator get the $8,000,000,000 from the gold? We have $4,400,000,000 of gold. If it is devaluated 50 percent, that only increases the amount $4,400,000,000.

Mr. REED. No, no. We have at the present time the 40-percent gold reserve required.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. REED. That backs up the outstanding 6 billions of currency that we now have. We have at this minute a surplus gold stock which would justify the issuance of about 4 billions of additional currency.

Mr. LONG. Oh, well——

Mr. REED. There is no demand for it, and that is why it is not issued. I am giving the maximum.

The immediate result, if all the powers were exercised, would be an addition of about $12,000,000,000 to our currency, with a possible additional 8 billions under this power to issue currency against our surplus gold stocks.

I think that answers the question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is not my intention now to enter upon a discussion of the currency amendment soon to be presented. I am happy to learn that my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania was misquoted when the statement was attributed to him by the press of the country that he was organizing something in the nature of a filibuster.

It is true that I recall that he said, in his statement disavowing any purpose to filibuster, that he and others associated with him intended to express their minds fully and freely.

Mr. REED. Freely, I said.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Freely, which may be subject to interpretation——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I do not want to have any misunderstanding about it. As I view the situation—of course, our leader on this side may see it differently—I do not see any reason why this amendment should not be conclusively disposed of by next Wednesday at the latest.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well, Mr. President. I am happy to have the assurance of the Senator from Pennsylvania that in his opinion the amendment may be disposed of by next Wednesday.

As I said in my statement, there is no purpose with which I am familiar to prevent Senators from expressing their minds freely. The subject is one of very great importance. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania has removed from the issue, for the present at least, what appeared to be the threat of an impending filibuster, and I thank him.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 13, line 18, after the word "reasons", it is proposed to insert:

Such loans shall be made to aid the orderly liquidation of any such bank in accordance with such plan as may be approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner. Before any such plan is approved by the Commissioner he shall be satisfied that the plan carries out the purposes of this section, and that such part of the proceeds of the loan as is devoted to settlements with bondholders will be used only to effect an equitable settlement with all bondholders. After the plan has been approved by the commissioner he shall require the bank to mail a copy thereof to all its known bondholders, and to publish a notice setting forth its provisions in at least three newspapers having general circulation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the proposed amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the Wagner amendment, as amended.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, line 10, of the Wagner amendment, immediately before the word "to", it is proposed to insert "(1)"; and in line 15, after the word "purposes", it is proposed to insert:

(2) irrigation districts organized under the laws of any State and operating under contract with the United States to aid in the payment of their operation and maintenance charges and provide funds for the installation and operation of necessary works and to protect the rights of the United States in the project,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the clause sought to be amended by the amendment I have sent to the desk is one that provides relief to these various reclamation projects. There is no reason why projects fostered by the Government in the first instance, on which Government money to the amount of millions of dollars has been expended, should not be included, so that those who have come into these projects, have settled the lands, and have made good up to the period of depression, may be aided.

May I explain that this amendment is solely for the purpose of aiding those who to a large extent have relieved the Government from its burden by taking over the project under State statutes, and have assisted the Government in reducing the expenses. By reason of the depression, by reason of the fact that they have been unable to sell their crops during the past 2 years, they find themselves unable to pay the maintenance and operation charges.

Is there any reason why they, of all the projects, should be segregated and set apart, and not allowed to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or from any one of the agencies of the Government, giving as security the bonds of the particular district? Is there any reason why they should be set apart so that this land may return to the Government and be entirely depleted of its value? They indeed should have the same consideration that any other reclamation project should have.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Where does the Senator find that in the proposed amendment we are providing any funds to any irrigation district for operating expenses? That is a departure from the principle of this bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly what I am trying to get away from—the departure. In other words, realizing that the learned Senator from New York does not know the nature of these projects, realizing that his knowledge is circumscribed because he does not understand the condition of these projects, I take it that the Senator does not understand what it is for those upon the projects to be behind in their payments to the Government for maintenance and operation.

"Maintenance and operation" means the maintenance of the project which is a burden upon the projector. Those who have come in there, taken up and reclaimed the land, applied the water and caused it to produce, are now confronted with the rules and regulations of the Department under which they operate to the extent that they cannot have the gates opened, so that they cannot even get water for this spring's crop, and unless they get water they are entirely deprived of the crop coming on this year. Maintenance and operation charges were imposed upon them last year and the year before. They were unable to meet those charges. Their alfalfa is on their hands. Their cattle are on their hands. Their grain is on their hands. They cannot get a dollar for it in any one of these projects.

On the other hand, at the solicitation of the Government these men have taken over the projects and have relieved the Government, coming in under State statutes, if you please. They elect their own board of directors. They have their own managers. They have relieved the Government of an enormous expense. They do not come under the direct head of Government projects. In other words, they are not entirely dependent on the Government for their support. They are in the course of agricultural pursuits. This amendment simply proposes that they may give to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the bonds of their particular district, voted by their people, pledging and promising that they will pay back the loan—that they may have the right to borrow from the agencies of the Government and pay as any other borrower would pay.

What secures this money? More than there is behind many of the projects, because the lands that were reclaimed by these projectors—if I may so term them—are Government lands, to which the initial title still remains in the Government. The projectors have not been able to pay off yet. Some of them are paying as high as $100 an acre. They have paid only $40, and still owe $60. Some of them have paid different prices. These people were brought into these projects at the solicitation and invitation of the Government. They did not come in seeking anything except what the Government said they should have.

I have in my possession circulars sent out over the United States, inviting homesteaders to come in and take up 80, 160, or 200 acres of this land and put their lives into it to reclaim it from a desert waste. It took three generations, if you please, to sod some of these projects. The first generation came in and the winds and the rains and the desert blasts swept them out, and they had to go. The next generation came on and found nothing better. The third generation came on and, perchance, established themselves. They are now established and have taken over these projects. All they are asking by reason of this amendment is the right to borrow—not the right to have a gift made to them—the right to borrow by the vote of their own projectors, those who have given their lives to these projects.

Is there any reason why the learned Senator from New York, whose knowledge of the West is circumscribed to Washington, in all probability, should say that he will not accept this amendment, and that those who have caused the desert to bloom, who made conditions as they are in the West, shall suffer, and he will circumscribe the whole situation so that those who came in under Government invitation shall not have the benefit of Government legislation?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I aroused the Senator to the extent of questioning my knowledge of the West. However, I do not think that is involved in this particular question.

I sympathize with the attitude of the Senator and in what he is seeking to accomplish for his constituents, and, so far as I am concerned, if the Senate wants to depart from the principle involved in this legislation, I am quite willing to accept it. But thus far we have limited the legislation to refinancing existing indebtedness. We will need a very much larger appropriation if we are also to extend these loans for the operation of the drainage districts and these other districts which are now operating. It is that departure which the Senate will have to determine.

I have no desire to prevent the Senator from getting the relief for those for whom he is pleading, but we will have to increase the authorization of $200,000,000 by a considerable sum, if we are to go into the business of lending money to these districts for the purpose of operating their particular projects. That is simply a matter of principle, which the Senate must decide. I want the Senator to be assured that I am in sympathy with his cause, and admire his fervid pleading.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, if I may reply, the Senator does not grasp the situation. I should like to have him understand it. This is not a question of paying for the continuation of the operating expenses of these projects. The proposed sum would not have to be increased at all. It is a question of meeting conditions which prevail now. If we do not do something for the settlers on these projects, these people who have come in and taken up the desert, this desert land will be turned back to the Government at a loss of millions and millions of dollars, because the Government in the first instance, inviting these homesteaders in there, spent $10,000,000 in cold cash on at least my own project, the Newlands project, named after the author of the law.

These farmers simply find themselves with their crops on their hands. They cannot move them. Certainly they must either move or get water for this season. The gates are shut down. They will not be opened until these expenses for last year have been paid. They will have to move out, and the land will revert to the Government, to the loss of the Government and the loss of the life and the blood and the money of those who came in there and tried to settle. That is all there is in this amendment, an opportunity for those who have tried to develop this country to get just a little assistance out of the money we are asked to appropriate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, no question can possibly be of more importance in this crisis of our economic history than the question of affording relief to American agriculture. It is a matter of such vital import to the whole of our people that we should proceed with extreme care. The farmers of the United States are, in my opinion, in no condition to withstand another Farm Board fiasco, which I greatly fear will be the result of this proposed act.

The story of American agriculture since the conclusion of the World War forms one of the major tragedies in the history of modern times. Arbitrarily limited and circumscribed by Mr. Hoover during the war, prevented from selling the products of the soil for the best price they would bring in the markets of the world, agriculture was caught almost immediately after the signing of the armistice in an artificial depression caused by the sudden deflation of agricultural values forced by the arbitrary action of the Federal Reserve Board. And this tragic situation has steadily deepened since 1921. In the false peudoprosperity of the Harding and Coolidge administrations, which we now know to have been only a stock-market prosperity, the 30,000,000 Americans making up the farm population of the United States had no part.

To fully comprehend the plight of the American farmer, it must be remembered that since the close of the war the farm debt of the United States has increased from less than $4,000,000,000 to more than $14,000,000,000, an increase of more than $10,000,000,000, a sum comparable to the whole of the interallied debt owed the United States by other nations which is being heralded as the great economic weight which is crushing the world. But there is this very essential difference between the foreign debt and the farm debt, and that is that the foreign debt was cut in half before it was funded—we gave our debtors over $11,000,000,000 outright—and then was funded over a long period, running up to 68 years, at the lowest possible rate of interest, while the farm debt of the United States consists of short-term obligations, constantly falling due, difficult to renew, to be renewed, if at all, only on ruinous commissions and bearing interest at 6 or 7 or 8 percent or even higher. The depreciation on the value of farm lands and improvements in the last 12 years has reached a staggering sum, well in excess of $20,000,000,000, a sum so vast as almost to pass the comprehension of the human mind.

Fundamentally, the tariff is primarily responsible for the condition of the farmer. The tariff on agricultural commodities thrown out as a sop to the farmer to induce him to endure the whole infernal prohibitive tariff system can never be effective on commodities in which we produce great exportable surpluses which must be sold abroad at prices regulated by world conditions. This fact was conclusively demonstrated in the last 2 years, when with a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, wheat actually sold out in western Kansas down to 24 cents a bushel.

What has happened to the farmer is this: That over a long period of years he has been compelled to buy everything he had to buy in a protected market and to sell everything he had to sell in a free market at prices regulated by world conditions. It has been the same proposition as if the farmer had been for years bucking a faro bank or some other gambling game in which there was a definite percentage against him. That would break Henry Ford or John D. Rockefeller if he kept it up long enough, and it has just about "busted" the American farmer now.

Mr. President, I am against the pending bill for reasons which I shall presently state, because I believe that it involves a serious abdication on the part of Congress and a delegation of power to a department of the executive abhorrent to our theory and system of government. I am against it because it is inadequate in its relief. It has been impossible for me to listen without a smile to some of the objections raised to this character of legislation. Old battle-scarred veterans of the army of privilege, men who vehemently defended every infamy in the Fordney-McCumber and Hoover-Grundy tariff bills, who voted for prohibitive tariffs in a revenue bill, have piously held up their hands in holy horror at the idea of imposing a tax for the benefit of a special class and at the idea of any interference with the law of supply and demand.

Mr. President, the protective tariff, which has now in many instances become the prohibitive tariff, was never anything except a tax on the consuming public in the interest of a special class. It is the cornerstone of privilege. Most of our economic evils are built around it. It is the most flagrant and outrageous interference with the law of supply and demand in the entire history of the world. It does not lie in the mouths of men who throughout their political lives have worn the livery of the devil of prohibitive tariffs to be complaining against special taxes in the interest of the agricultural class who have been brought to ruin by that very system.

How can a man support the prohibitive tariff system and protest against interference with the law of supply and demand? The tariff, by its very nature, is an interference with the law of supply and demand. The Esch-Cummins Act, the Interstate Commerce Commission Act, the Federal Trade Commission law, the Packers and Stockyards Act, the Adamson law, the 8-hour law, the Convict Labor Act, are all interferences with the law of supply and demand. The public utility laws of the various States granting monopolies to certain favored utilities are nothing but interferences with the law of supply and demand. Half the laws on the statute books are interferences with the law of supply and demand—some of them good and some of them bad. But men who have cheerfully and vigorously participated in every form of infringement on that law in the interest of protected industry and entrenched capital are now sore at heart and struck with horror at the idea of any invasion of the law of supply and demand for the benefit of the farm population of the United States.

Mr. President, my opposition to this measure is on far different grounds. With the declared purposes of the proposed law I am in entire sympathy. With the declaration of emergency, which is the prelude to title I, I am in entire agreement as affording a reasonable explanation of the action of Congress, although I cannot agree that a congressional declaration of emergency can possibly supply any constitutional sanction for acts otherwise unconstitutional.

My objection to this measure, Mr. President, is that it involves a more sweeping abdication of power by the Congress than has yet been accomplished in the history of our Government, and that it invests the Secretary of Agriculture, a mere statutory officer, with powers more dictatorial than have ever been entrusted to any official, military or civil, in wartime or peacetime, not excluding the various Presidents of the United States, since the adoption of the Constitution.

Under the terms of the bill, the Secretary of Agriculture is invested with dictatorial power over the farmers and a large part of the industries of the United States. He is given power to tax one industry and not to tax another, to apply the tax in one portion of the United States and to refrain from levying it in another, to tax the processors of one commodity for the purpose of increasing the price of another commodity. He is even granted authority to increase tariff rates, and to exercise the authority imposed by the Constitution on Congress of regulating import duties. He is authorized to suspend the antitrust laws of the Nation. These are grants, not to the President, but to a mere statutory official.

The President himself is left without authority to curb the exercise of these extraordinary powers except by removal of the Secretary of Agriculture. Without suggesting that such a thing is likely to happen in the present situation, it is not amiss, perhaps, to remark in the consideration of a measure which may become a precedent that there have been instances when Cabinet officers defied Presidents, notably in the case of Secretary Duane in Jackson's administration, and Secretary Stanton in Johnson's administration. In the latter case a hostile congressional majority actually asserted the right of a member of the Cabinet to exercise statutory authority and to defy removal by the Executive himself. The refusal of the President to accede to this proposition led to his impeachment and a trial by this body, where he was saved from conviction by a margin of only 1 vote.

We are asked to grant to the Secretary of Agriculture powers of which such distinguished public servants as Alexander Hamilton, Albert Gallatin, Robert J. Walker, and Salmon P. Chase never even dreamed.

Congress is asked to sign a blank check and to hand it over to be filled in by the Secretary of Agriculture. Powers are here delegated which were never requested by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, or Lincoln. Powers are here given to the Secretary of Agriculture such as Woodrow Wilson never requested for a subordinate during the worst crises of the World War. No President of the United States has ever exercised such power as is conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture by this measure.

Moreover, Mr. President, I regard the relief sought to be achieved under the terms of the bill as inadequate. As I said in the beginning of my remarks, no one realizes more keenly than I the plight of the American farmer and no one is more anxious to help him than am I. But I do not believe that this end can be achieved under the pending measure.

When in the early days of the Hoover administration, through the Farm Marketing Act, the farmers of the country were led to expect great things in the way of improvement of farm conditions, these high hopes resulted only in overwhelming disappointment. The Farm Board fiasco resulted in tragic disaster for American agriculture. I do not wish to disappoint the farmers of the United States again, for they are in no condition to stand it.

Whether we know it or not, we are dealing with the farm-relief question for the last time. The farmer's condition is so desperate, his powers of resistance have sagged so low that this time relief must be adequate or it will be forever too late.

During the progress of the recent campaign President Roosevelt repeatedly stated that prosperity could never be permanently restored to the United States until the buying power of the millions who make up our farm population and the additional millions who live in the small towns and villages of the United States has been fully restored. This diagnosis of the President has never been successfully challenged. If his conclusions were correct, then it must follow that we will content ourselves with a measure of half-way farm relief at our peril.

If it is really our purpose to restore the buying power of the farmer—and, in my opinion, nothing could be of greater benefit to industry as well as agriculture—than restoration to the farm prices of the period 1909 to 1914 is, in my judgment, little more than a gesture in this direction. Since the period 1909 to 1914 the farmers' costs of production have greatly increased, as was ably shown last week by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], when he demonstrated the extent to which the farmers' freight rates, taxes, interest on debts, merchandise costs, and other expenses have increased since the period of 1909 to 1914. Therefore it seems to me to be farcical to assert that the pending bill will restore the farmers' buying power.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not believe that the leasing of some 50,000,000 acres of so-called "marginal land" is sound. In the first place, it will require an army of men to administer it, and that at a time when every effort is being made to reduce expenditures. In the second place, it will necessarily constitute a sort of pension system or dole. Once fastened upon the Government, it may become the permanent policy of our Nation. In the third place, it has never been demonstrated that the existing surpluses are normal surpluses. Such surpluses are as much the result of underconsumption as of overproduction. Before retiring vast areas of land from production, it might be desirable to find out how much these surpluses amount to when consumption has been restored to normal and the American people are again eating three square meals a day. Moreover, Mr. President, we cannot adequately estimate the real farm surplus until after there has been a breaking down of the indefensible, prohibitive tariff walls and until some opportunity has been offered for exchanging our surplus wheat, cotton, and pork for foreign products and merchandise which is not seriously competitive with our own industries.

Mr. President, surely there must be some simpler and less expensive method through which our various farm surpluses can be so segregated that we will be able to assure to the farmer a fair price in the domestic market. This is the heart of the problem with which we are dealing. In my opinion, there is no way under high heaven of successfully regulating the various farm surpluses under the marginal acreage theory; for if by this or any other method these surpluses should be reduced to the vanishing point, there will inevitably be years of short crops when our production of wheat and other farm commodities will not be sufficient to supply our own needs. Congress certainly does not wish to deliberately invite such a situation.

There have been long periods in our history when our farm surpluses constituted the most important part of the wealth of the Nation. If world trade were once again permitted to flow in its natural channels this might well occur again. Therefore, Mr. President, I repeat that the sound and sensible policy would be to continue to produce surpluses, but to so segregate them so that they will not be a factor in our domestic markets.

Mr. President, this measure represents a conglomeration of several different legislative propositions, having no logical or reasonable connection with each other, some of which are good and some of which are bad. It was apparently the theory of those who prepared this proposed act that by adding on such meritorious measures as the so-called "Smith cotton bill", contained in part 1 of title I, and the measure for refinancing farm mortgages and drainage district bonds, Senators will be compelled to swallow the obnoxious portions of the bill.

I am intensely interested in the matter of refinancing farm mortgages. I am very much in favor of the provision of the bill for affording relief to drainage districts, which is strikingly similar to the provisions of a bill which I myself recently introduced in this body. There is no necessity whatever for the inclusion of these measures in the pending bill. They are embodied in a separate bill which passed the House last week and is now pending in the Senate and may be brought up for consideration at any time. I protest, Mr. President, that the action of the committee in undertaking to bludgeon Senators into swallowing obnoxious propositions by tying them on to propositions of merit is both dishonest and unfair. For my part, I voted for and actively supported the Smith bill in the last Congress and would gladly do so again. I should gladly vote for title II having to do with the refinancing of farm mortgages. But I cannot vote for the rest of the bill, no matter into what kind of a hodge-podge it may be thrown.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is temporarily absent. I desire to offer an amendment to his amendment. I have asked that he be notified. Perhaps it is just as well to state the amendment for the benefit of the clerk, since it has already been drawn to the attention of the Senator from New York.

On page 19, line 14, of the amendment of the Senator from New York I move to strike out the word "completed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is a different amendment from the one which the clerk has at the desk. I am moving orally to strike out the word "completed" and, after the word "projects", to add the words "substantially advanced toward completion and".

The original text as submitted by the Senate committee in the form of an amendment used the word "undertaken" in connection with "projects". The amendment of the Senator from New York uses the word "completed". Neither word would appear to be entirely satisfactory because of technical objections which may be raised. Obviously the word "undertaken" would allow too broad a latitude, and the word "completed" may prevent the use of certain funds for refinancing even where maintenance incidental to construction, and other similar proper purposes may indicate something less than absolute completion. Has the Senator from New York any comment to make?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not think that this proposed amendment materially changes the purpose of the particular provision, and I am quite willing to have the amendment go to conference for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the word "completed" and, after the word "projects" in the same line, to insert "substantially advanced toward completion and".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask the clerk to read another amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, line 12, after the word "State", it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "including private corporations organized for drainage, levee, levee and drainage, or irrigation purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I also offer the amendment appearing at the desk on the same sheet as the amendment which has just been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, line 15, after the word "projects", it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "including, in the case of irrigation systems, dams and reservoirs, and electric-power projects developed by, incident to, and directly connected with such irrigation systems."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment on page 8, line 2, to strike out the words "may, in his discretion", and insert the word "shall". My amendment makes mandatory, instead of purely discretionary, that farm-loan banks shall be authorized to make loans to individual borrowers in districts where there are no farm-loan associations from which they can obtain the loan. It has been heralded throughout the country that there was being set up in this bill a convenient and accessible method whereby the small farmer could obtain loans, I believe, up to $5,000 even in sections that are not included within a Federal land-bank district or a land-bank association district.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the place where the amendment is to be made.

Mr. TRAMMELL. On page 8, in the latter part of line 2, I propose to strike out the words "may, in his discretion", and insert "shall".

Mr. WAGNER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss at length the very plain proposition as to which way we should vote, but on page 8 of the amendment of the Senator from New York I desire to strike out lines 12 to 16, inclusive. That is the provision in the bill which requires one half of 1 percent interest more upon farmers who borrow under this provision than under the general provisions of the bill. I move that that section be stricken out—page 8, lines 12 to 16, inclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida proposes, on page 8, to strike out lines 12 to 16, as follows:

> The rate of interest on such direct loans made at any time by any Federal land bank shall be one half of 1 percent per annum in excess of the rate of interest charged to borrowers on mortgage loans made at such time by the bank through national farm-loan associations.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This provision requires a greater amount of interest from a person obtaining a loan direct than in sections where they have not the convenience of these banks than does the provision in my amendment. My idea is to put them on a parity in the matter of interest.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I would suggest that it has been the policy, in the loans made by the farm land banks ever since their existence began, that where the loan is not made to an association one half of 1 percent additional interest is charged. It is again a question of whether the Senate wants to depart from that very thoroughly long-established principle.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that should be changed, especially at the present time, when the Government is assuming practically all responsibility of straightening up our financial wrecks and correcting certain features of our joint-stock land banks. It seems to me we should be as liberal as possible with the farmer who has borrowed or may borrow under the plan Congress is now making.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think the Senator meant to say the farm land banks are wrecked. They are in a very healthy financial condition at the present time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I did not mean that literally, but the provisions of the bill, according to my construction, have dealt much more generously with the banks and stockholders and bondholders than with the poor, helpless farmer whom we are trying to assist. I want them all dealt with fairly, but I want the farmer treated as fairly and generously as possible under the present circumstances. No class of our people is more in need of liberal aid.

Mr. WAGNER. I am sure the Senator must misunderstand the intent of the bill. I think the primary benefits are extended to the farmer. I think the primary benefit to the farmer is to reduce his indebtedness. If incidental to that the banks which have financed the particular loans are benefited somewhat, too, it is purely incidental, but the primary purpose of the bill is to lighten the burden of debt on the farmer.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I fully appreciate that it has a number of splendid provisions, and I am going to support them, but I offer that comment. It is merely my own opinion. The bill is much more generous in its provisions in the protection of the banks and stockholders and bondholders than in the protection and for the assistance of the farmer. I mean no reflection, but that is my opinion. I did not write the bill; but if I had been writing it, my center of sympathy and desire to assist would have been around the farmer who is in desperate circumstances and needing the assistance of the Government. I believe the average person who will read the bill will certainly not accuse anybody of discriminating in any instance in behalf of the farmer.

Mr. WAGNER. The rates of interest are reduced, and wherever the Federal land bank purchased a mortgage at less than the face value of the mortgage, that difference goes directly to the farmer.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It certainly should. I know of a great many generous banks who give the farmer the benefit of anything of that sort now without a law requiring it. That is a wise concession frequently for both parties. If we get anything out of the bill in the interest of the farmer, I am very thankful for it, but I do not think it has been written as favorably to the farmers of the land as it has in behalf of the banker and the people who have their money invested in the enterprise with which we are dealing.

Mr. WAGNER. Has the Senator any suggestion to make?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; I have one. I want to offer an amendment. I want to place the person who got the direct loan upon the same basis, as to interest, as any other person.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to state that the reason for that is that, ordinarily, in dealing through a Federal land bank, an association is formed and members of the association subscribe for stock in the bank and also guarantee the paper of the borrowers in the association. The reason for the one half of 1 percent was that there is no guaranty back of the direct loan as there is back of the loan made to the association. In other words, the bank has the security of all the borrowers of the association.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; I know they combine them in that way, but it seems to me in making an individual a loan which is authorized they would exercise the same precaution that they would in making a loan where the borrowers are in an association. Of course, they have that much additional security. In view of the fact that the money, when obtained from the Government, is obtained at a rate of interest that permits a certain spread, I do not see why we should tax the person because he is inconveniently situated and charge him more interest than we would if he were conveniently located for the purpose of getting his money.

Mr. CAREY. The cost of administration is a little greater in the individual loan, and the association assists the bank in looking after the loans, which is not possible where a man is not a member of the association.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am strongly in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Florida, for the reason that the 4½ percent rate of interest to the farmer is too high in comparison with the other rates of interest. In my opinion there is no excuse for charging the independent farmer who is not in an association one half of 1 percent more. I should like to see the next two paragraphs, which provide for the association, stricken out also. We have no way of judging the future except by the past. In the past these associations or the regulations compelling associations to be formed and compelling the borrower to take 5 percent of the amount of his loan in capital stock have proved to be only an additional burden in the way of an additional interest rate upon the borrower. The bill is a 5-year bill, and an additional 1 percent per annum means 5 percent for the 5 years. It means an additional 1 percent for a loan made at 5½ percent instead of 4½ percent. The three paragraphs should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. (Putting the question.) The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Let us have a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment. I will read it and then send it to the desk. On page 6, at the end of line 13, add the following paragraph:

That where it appears that the property mortgaged is worth less than the amount of the mortgage and the charges on the property, the mortgagor may request reappraisal of the property; and if it is ascertained that the property mortgaged is of less value than the amount due on the mortgage, a readjustment of the sum of the mortgage shall be made, and such reduction made that it will equal the amount of the value of the property as reappraised, and thereafter that will be the amount of charge against the property on account of the mortgage.

The idea is that if there is a mortgage existing upon a farm for $10,000, for illustration, and the man is unable to carry the mortgage, and it is known to him and to his neighbors and everybody else that property values have depreciated until the property is now really worth only $5,000, and if the representatives of the bank will make a little inquiry they will find it is not worth over $5,000, then we should readjust the situation in regard to the amount of mortgage under the appraisal, and the mortgage shall then be continued at the amount of the appraised value.

Of course, that would sound very ridiculous and absurd in normal times when business was going along in its ordinary, customary way; but when Congress is making provision to assist with Government funds this and that enterprise, all kinds of private institutions, and when in this bill Congress is providing for making adjustments, charge-offs, and prop-ups for the farm-loan banks, why should we not readjust to the extent that we will not have a mortgage continued for $10,000 when the property, upon an appraisal by the representatives of the bank, is found to be worth only $5,000? Why not have a readjustment? Why not let the farmer continue to own his own farm with a smaller mortgage upon it, instead of foreclosing and then permitting a stranger to acquire it at the smaller valuation?

It seems to me that the Government would lose nothing by it, and it would often give a farmer an opportunity to continue his operations and an opportunity to live; whereas, upon the other hand, with the $10,000 mortgage hanging over him without any adjustment whatever, he could not possibly ever extricate himself from that indebtedness, and the Government would be no better off.

Of course, something has been said here about the question of interest, about charging off some interest; but provision is made for the Government paying that interest. It is claimed we are very sympathetic to the farmer and allow him a certain reduction of interest; but we see to it in the provisions of this bill that the spread we give to the farmer in the nature of a reduction is paid to the banks by the Government—paid first by an appropriation, and then, after that is exhausted, it is paid by a reduction of the amount of interest that we charge to the banker for the funds he is using in carrying on these transactions.

I desire to try out this plan and see if it would not bring about a better condition in instances of mortgages where the properties are not worth, say, more than half the face value of the mortgage, under present reduced valuations, in the hope that it would eventually help the poor farmer, who is in a condition where he never can pay off a mortgage that is twice the amount of the value of his property. This plan would also assist the Government, because it would have the effect of encouraging the farmer to go ahead, when otherwise he would know that there was no possibility of his extricating himself from this situation and would give up in despair.

I will say that while that kind of a transaction is not customary, it is not by any means unknown in private affairs. I have known a good many times in my own State of readjustments between a creditor and a debtor. As an illustration, they would get together, and the creditor would say, "You owe me $10,000. Your security is not worth over $5,000. I know that there is no chance for you to pay." The debtor says, "If you can just fix this in some way on a $5,000 basis, I can work it out." So they get together and make such an adjustment.

I should like to see a provision along the line proposed by my amendment. The amendment is rather crudely worded. I wrote it at my desk here, with talking all around me; yet the language makes plain my purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, as I understand, what the Senator proposes is that if a mortgagor having a mortgage of $10,000 makes application to have a reappraisal of the property upon which the mortgage is given, and that reappraisal indicates that the value of the property is one half the amount of the mortgage—that is, it is worth $5,000—then the mortgagee by law will be compelled to reduce that mortgage by 50 percent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That would be part of the process of a rearrangement of this whole situation.

Mr. WAGNER. How can we, by law, compel a mortgagee to reduce his mortgage, the amount of money which is owing to him?

Mr. TRAMMELL. We can use some of these little inoffensive methods that you use in regard to some other matters by simply saying that banks can get money only if they agree to certain policies. That is the way your bill forces certain other relief. We provide that before they can get the money they must promise that they will do certain things.

Mr. WAGNER. But under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, we by law are saying to a mortgagee, "After we reappraise the property, and determine that the value of the property is less than the face of the mortgage, you, the mortgagee, must reduce the mortgage down to the actual value of the property." I do not know of any constitutional way in which we can compel such a reduction; and I am sure that is clearly in violation of all constitutional rights.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was thinking that we would have to use one of these circuitous routes, of course, for enforcing it.

Mr. WAGNER. This is not a circuitous route. This is direct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. But in a great many other instances, when some individual Senators want to enforce something about which there is a question from a legal standpoint, they seem to devise just a little pressure here and there; and, the first thing we know, we have a situation where they succeed in getting what they desire.

I would plead for an ingenuity on behalf of the farmers equal to that exercised for the benefit of other interests.

I believe this proposal could be worked out along the line of my amendment. Of course this is a practice that exists to quite an extent in private business. I have known of bankers who have readjusted and restated accounts, thinking it was better both for the bank and for the debtor to have a readjustment.

I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which is to be offered on behalf of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and myself, to strike out, on page 4, paragraph (2), the words beginning "By proclamation", on line 20, down to and including the words "foreign currencies", in line 24, and to insert certain language in lieu thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that amendment offered to the pending amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. No; I offer this as an amendment to the so-called "Thomas amendment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not under consideration at this time.

Mr. WHEELER. Out of order, then, I ask to offer this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks that he may offer this amendment and have it printed and lie on the table to await the consideration of the Thomas amendment. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is still before the Senate and open to amendment. Are there any further amendments to be offered to it?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am advised that there is now pending on the desk of the Presiding Officer the amendment offered by myself on yesterday and thereafter referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am advised that the Banking and Currency Committee has made a report. At this time I call for the report submitted by the committee upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the report is not available at the moment. It will be available in a short while. Does the Senator desire to offer his amendment as an amendment to the pending Wagner amendment?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No; I offer it as part VI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order until the Senate disposes of the amendment that is now pending. The Chair understood that it was to be offered, not as an amendment to this amendment but as an independent amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Chair is correct, and at the proper time I will call up the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to recognize the Senator from Oklahoma. The amendment which is now pending, known as the "Wagner amendment", should be disposed of first.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the so-called "Wagner amendment", as a substitute for title II, the amendment which I send to the desk. I do not care to have it read unless that is required. It is a measure that I have introduced in the last three sessions of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be considered without being read.

Mr. FRAZIER's amendment was, on page 27, beginning with line 7, to strike out through line 5 on page 43, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE II

SEC. 21. This title shall be known as "The Farmers' Farm Relief Act."

SEC. 22. That the Government now perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, through which farm indebtedness and farm mortgages now existing may be liquidated and refinanced, through real-estate mortgages on the amortization plan, at 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal per annum, and through mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes at 3 percent interest per annum through the use of the machinery of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve Banking System.

SEC. 23. The Federal Farm Loan Board is hereby authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making real-estate loans, secured by first mortgages on farms, to an amount equal to the fair value of such farms and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, through the use of the machinery of the Federal land banks and national farm-loan associations, and to make all necessary rules and regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of this title with expedition. In case such farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness to be liquidated and refinanced exceeds the fair value of any farm and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, then such farm mortgages and indebtedness shall be scaled down in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. Such loans shall be made at a rate of 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal per annum, payable in any lawful money of the United States.

SEC. 24. The Federal Farm Loan Board is further authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up chattel mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making loans at the rate of 3 percent interest per annum, secured by first mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, to an amount equal to 65 percent of the fair market value thereof, such loans to run for a period of 1 year, with right of renewal from year to year for a term of 10 years: Provided, That any depreciation in the value of such livestock is replaced by additional livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, and the amount of the loan is reduced 10 percent each year.

SEC. 25. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, $100,000 for the use of the Federal Farm Loan Board to carry out the provisions of this title. The necessary and actual expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions in this title shall be apportioned and prorated and added to each individual mortgage, and such sums so added shall be paid to the Federal Farm Loan Board for administrative purposes.

SEC. 26. The funds with which to liquidate and refinance existing farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness shall be provided by the issuing of farm-loan bonds by the Federal farm-loan system, through the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal land banks, as now provided by law, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 1½ percent per annum, if secured by mortgages on farms, and 3 percent per annum if secured by chattel mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes. These bonds, after delivery to the Federal Farm Loan Board, may, by it, be sold at par to any individual or corporation, or to any State, National, or Federal Reserve bank, or to the Treasurer of the United States. And it shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve banks to invest their available surplus and net profits after the dividends are paid to their stockholders in such farm-loan bonds, such profits to include the franchise tax now paid to the United States.

SEC. 27. In case all of said farm-loan bonds are not readily purchased, then the Federal Farm Loan Board shall present the remainder to the Federal Reserve Board, and the Board shall forthwith cause to be issued and delivered to the Federal Farm Loan Board Federal Reserve notes to an amount equal to the par value of such bonds as are presented to it. Such farm-loan bonds to be held by the Federal Reserve Board as security in lieu of any other security or reserve.

SEC. 28. The Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal land banks shall turn over all payments of interest and principal on such farm-loan bonds, for which the Federal Reserve Board issues Federal Reserve notes to the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be by him kept for the purpose of redeeming said Federal Reserve notes and reinvested by him as a sinking fund in municipal or State bonds and bearing interest at the rate of at least 2 percent per annum, both principal and interest to be paid in any lawful money of the United States.
